But here is the culmination of the mason Truth:

"If you ask me what qualities a bricklayer should have for To reach the heart of true good, I will tell you that, in order to get there... We must have crushed the head of the serpent of worldly ignorance, shaken the yoke of childhood prejudices concerning the dominant religion of country where one was born. All religious worship was invented only through the hope of to command and to occupy the first rank among men; that by a laziness which, through false piety, breeds the greed to acquire other people's property; finally, that through gluttony, daughter of hypocrisy, which she uses everything to satisfy the carnal senses of those she possesses of, and who constantly offer him, on an altar erected in their hearts, holocausts that voluptuousness, lust, and perjury procured for them.

That is the painting faithful to what the vulgar fool worships under the name of religion.

We have already seen this snake, twisting a globe on the tail of the Rosicrucian Order, Unthau, in the 25th degree. We will find him again still at the rank of Kadosh, and always with the same significance: bad principle, religion or superstition, authority, especially monarchical, or ambition, ignorance, or army, loyalty, pro-Priesthood, original sin.

"Hiram was the truth on earth, Abiram was a monster produced by the serpent of ignorance, which has now been able to erect altars in the heart of this timid layman. This hundred-headed hydra deceived and deceived. still continually the men who are subject to his rule, and the will deceive until the moment the true chosen ones appear to fight him and destroy it entirely (1).

This rank, Ragon adds, is of the utmost antiquity. It offers to the recipient the principles of natural law or of nature, essential part of the ancient mysteries (2), whatever he may have said, plus several times elsewhere, that the word and the ranks of knights dated of the crusades, were unknown in antiquity and indicated a recent era.

We also don't quite understand how, the unknown or eight zeros being the only reasonable date of creation which is eternal, in the principles of Freemasonry, the authorized interpreter and all his colleagues from the Grand Orient were able to learn with such precision to determine what happened immediately afterwards, and to know the age thoroughly of gold and the wild or natural state, then the origin and the ravages of the hydra with a hundred heads. And if they did not know, if it is important to them It is possible to go back to the origin or eternity of the world, that Does it become the very basis of Freemasonry? Is it, can it be Anything else, according to his own principles, than a blatant lie?

Nothing else is clearer than this rank, nothing characterizes better the hypocritical impiety of Masonic teachings and the goal what the sect wants to achieve, namely the destruction of all religion in all its ranks, but especially in its true chosen ones, its sublime chosen ones, and his knights or masons of the high degrees. Clavel also said, without mincing words, that the Knight of the Sun has with the aim of establishing natural religion on the ruins of all revealed religions (3).

He even adds further on, speaking of this rank as ren-closing off sections full of meaning and value:

"The goal of initiation is to free the subject from ties and confession" correcting the error, and leading him to the knowledge of the truth. The Venerable One addressed him with an explanatory speech on the emblems of the Freemasonry, which he represents to him as covering precepts of a bold philosophy, and he encourages him to break free from the yoke of belief

- This is the tangible negation of the Christian mystery of the holy Trinity. And to better erase faith from the hearts of the followers, the Freemasonry instructors oppose him with "the natural trinity, cause and preserver of the universe, as the sages of antiquity represented by the Delta or sacred triangle, emblem of the goddess Isis or nature (1); » and they represent her under the emblem of the simple or triple triangle.

As for the quaternary, which is based on the ternary, which is based himself on F unit, he was employed, says Ragon, by the initiates, "as F, emblem of the movement and of Vinfini, and represented" "Everything that is neither corporeal nor sensory."

We have the explanation of unity, the ternary, and the quaternary. Masonic order.

But what name do we give to this unit, the base of the triangle in the ternary, and foundation of the three other sides in the quaternaire? Isn't it FIRE, the primordial, unique, universal agent? which has manifested itself in all sensory productions, which fire dominates in man or in animal? Also, it is in the fire that the 29th Scottish grade is specially consecrated: its color is red, the color of fire, according to the the hierophant's word, and his signs, says the General Manual, are the signs of the three kingdoms that it produces in nature. It also has the sign of the Sun, the quintessential image of fire, a sign that becomes saying: I compassed up to the sun. There is also another symbol, said sign of horror, which consists of turning the head to the left, re-keeping to the ground, and raising both hands, carrying them slightly on the right (1).

This sign is probably made after looking at the cross which is engraved on the ground.

That look of horror, those heels forming, on the top of that Jerusalem cross or Calvary cross, the leveling square and equality with the earth, are obviously not intended to honor it. Is such an act not common among infidel and persecuting peoples? Is the sign of apostasy from the Far East? Is it surprising that... after having renounced, in the rank of Rose-Croix, the divinity of the God-Man, who was nailed to this cross for the redemption of the world, we trample it underfoot with a look of horror and contempt, as the symbol of Christian superstition, as The victorious enemy of the Sun God? "The Knight Kadosh," said the great official interpreter from the beginning of the explanation of this grade, puts aside the pencil and the burin (symbol of the first grades and chapters) to erect balusters, that he dates near the burning bush, B.\ A.*., image of the few, symbol of the truth, which sufficiently indicates the brothers' occupation in this matter grace, or rather, that which reveals the philosophical spirit of the degree. Existence of a high rank, where lower-ranking masons only arrive after having given to the order of long proofs of ability and dedication, is to any necessity—Knight Kadosh must be ready to take charge of everything that will be ordered of him for the happiness of humanity and the triumph of good (1). He knows the moral, intellectual, civilized man, and all the external nature; he also knows his general rights and duties. The Kadosh is therefore not only the mason of the lodges, the mason of chapters, but admitted to the third sanctuary, it is to him that he addresses These two precepts of the ancient initiations would be: Devote yourself to the natural science, study politics for the happiness of your people blables. how it is the necessary complement to true Freemasonry
Let us now enter the interior of the grade, and penetrate to its deepest sanctuary:

"There are four apartments in this grade: the initiation is accomplished" in the fourth.

The Hebrew word kadosh means holy, consecrated, purified. It is not necessary to believe that the knights of Vaille, white and black, had some pre-attention to holiness. They want to express by this word that they alone are the chosen ones, the men par excellence, purified of all the defilement of the meadows" judged. This word heralds a preparation for great mysteries. We

"A black and white drapery, dotted with red crosses," they add Willaume and Teissier, descend into the wings of the eagle and form a pavillon; on each side of the throne are two flags, one white with one green cross, the other black with a red cross, and a double eagle with these words: Conquer or die, embroidered in silver. The eagle has beaks and gold nails. The head of the council or senate is called the grand master, or grand commander, or grand sovereign; he is styled three times powerful, and represents Frederick II, King of Prussia.

"All officers take the title of Grand and Perfect. The brothers are called great knights.

We know of one of those ranks whose maxims are horrifying weak and therefore anti-Masonic – (although everywhere dependent of the Grand Orients within Freemasonry, and subject to the supreme authority who commands there). – He is undoubtedly the one who inspired Barruel to to be Freemasonry.

The mason's walk in this degree indicates its spirit. One finds there knows that of the philosopher, who is not deterred by the prejudices of his era; his leaps show that he knows how to overcome anything and that for him, death is not an obstacle. He thus arrives at the complete knowledge of the Masonic God, which is completed and becomes aware in man, as the grandmaster speaks Cousin and his entire school, or university philosophy and the State teachings. This God presents himself to the master mason under the shape of the Greek delta, or of the sacred triangle, whose sides depicted are the three kingdoms of nature, or God. In the middle is The Hebrew yod, the animating spirit, or fire, the generative principle represented to the companion by the letter G in the blazing star te, and which also means geometry and generation. The 1st side of the The triangle offered for the apprentice's study is the mineral kingdom, symbolized by Tubulcain, password; the 2nd entrusted to the companion is the plant kingdom, also signified by the password Schibboleth, which means ear of corn. is divided into three branches: unity of man with himself; unity of man with God; unity of man with the universe (1).

From this it follows that, in man, the body and the soul are one sole substance; – that man and God are but one to be, but a single substance – that man, God and the universe they are all one and the same, a living and absolute being.

It's always, with a few variations in position, the same Mr. Cousin's formula: God, nature, humanity, infinity and finitude all together, triple infinity, indivisibility and totality etc. Incline– You, masons and academic philosophers, prostrate yourselves before before the God whom sovereign reason reveals to you,

In England, the disciples of Owen, the founder of New Har– Mony had adopted this motto: The true Satan, Karl Marx and Buchner, the leaders of the German naturalist school, the founders of Y International, no less brutally assert the absolute materialism that a century and a half of work Masonic culture prepared men of modern culture to acc to proclaim:

"For Hegel," said Karl Marx, in the work which is the Koran of. Y Internationale, the movement of thought which he personifies under the name The idea is the demiurge of reality, which is only the phenominal form nomenclature of the idea. For me, on the contrary, the movement of thought is only the reflection of the real movement transported and transposed into the human brain.

And from these premises he reads, with indisputable logic, the a dark dogma that incites nihilists to fanaticism:

We will show (Book II, Chapter XIV, Section 4) that they are all sorts of ties of Freemasonry which provided them with their founders and their doctrines.

It is in vain that honest people are led astray into the lodges want to escape this solidarity. The form, the expression are different; the essence of the doctrines is the same. The blasphemies of the students at the Liège congress, who in the events of 1865 caused so much emotion, but were ultimately only an echo of noisy doctrines taught under the reign of Napoleon III, at the Paris medical school, and in a large number of other schools, even of girls (1).

They were applauded in the Senate by a disciple of the father Enfantin, formerly a professor at the École Normale Supérieure, whose All members echoed him (2). They were propagated highly by a Minister of Public Instruction who teaches in the manual he had the audacity to call Sacred History, that Man is but dust and returns to dust, and who Elsewhere he added that man returned to the bosom of the nature after having traversed, under the guidance of nature, all the degrees of the animal kingdom, starting with the monkey (3). "Free thinkers recognize and proclaim the freedom of trust" science and freedom of inquiry. They consider science to be the only the basis of all belief, and consequently reject any dogma founded on any revelation whatsoever. They demand an investigation for all the degrees, free, compulsory, exclusively secular and materialistic. In this which concerns the philosophical and religious question, considering that The idea of God is the source and support of all despotism and all iniquity, considering that the Catholic religion is the most complete and the most terrible personification of this idea, that the whole of its dogmas is the very negation of society; free thinkers assume the obligation the mission to work towards the prompt and radical abolition of Catholicism, to its annihilation, by all means, including revolutionary force naire (1). »

The freethinkers of Lyon had delegated to the anti-council F.*. Andrieux, now Prefect of Police, and on this occasion In the Excommunicated of November 27, 1869, we read:

ANTI-COUDI OF NAPLES

XIV. – The new evolution of Freemasonry.
– The abolition of the name of God and of immortality the soul in the statutes.

This audacious challenge, thrown in 1877 to the belief of humankind by the Grand Orient of France, was essentially just a lifting of curtain, which revealed to the eyes of the dupes what has always been formed the basis of Masonic doctrine.

What is this religion that proclaims indifference?
systematic between the most contradictory dogmas, if not a hypocritical denial of the creator God who, sovereign master of his creatures, must necessarily be recognized and adored by them in its truth?

Brother Golphin stated very clearly to the Memphis lodge that also :

"Just as there is a natural right which is the source of all the positive laws, of course there is a universal religion which contains all the particular religions of the globe: it is this religion that we nothing, and uniting them, thus reduced, by the link of science and

The first hypothesis is not admissible, due to the ab-

The basis of Freemasonry being such, the innocuous measure taken by the Grand Orient in 1866 against the lodge V'Avenir (See below) (sus, S 12) had no other meaning than that of a measure of the police. As long as Freemasonry was an institution official tuition of the Empire, some consideration was due to beliefs of the vast majority of the French people.

But, although among the initiates no one could be mistaken about the real impact of this measure, it would have resulted in overexcitement the more advanced party of Freemasonry which wanted to raise the last niens voiles.

The question arose at the congress of the Eastern lodges, which included the deputies from the lodges of Strasbourg, Nancy, Vesoul, of Metz, Châlons-sur-Marne, Reims, Mulhouse, Sarreguemines. This congress will meet in Metz, from July 29th to January 1st. August 1869 – just a year before the war and the invasion that were about to devastate these cities, – and demanded the suppression of the article of the Statuts of the Grand Orient of France, which since the Convention of the 26 October 1854 was thus conceived:

"The purpose of the Freemasons' order is benevolence, the study of morality and the practice of all virtues.

"It is based on: The existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and love." of humanity.

Congress requested that it be replaced by a declaration bearing in mind that Freemasonry had as its sole principle solidarity human dignity (1). The initiator of this movement was Brother Macé, senior university official, who, at the instigation of the minister Duruy, Minister of Public Instruction, had just founded the Vendée League teaching intended to eliminate all religion from schools and by there, as he said, to really put into practice the Principles proclaimed in the lodges. The preamble to the 1854 constitution was indeed a innovation, a brand name put in place after the fact, at the time when the Pantheistic and atheist doctrines tended to become public, so as not to alienate honest people and not to finish off to drive away everything that still serves to whitewash the sepulchre Masonic. Before the convention of October 28, 1854, there was only... tion neither of God, nor of the immortality of the soul in the constitutions of the order.

It was just a label for the dupes, to better stifle... to do what has always and everywhere been understood by the word God. We have seen it through countless proofs: it is Pan, it is Isis is nature, the god of Béranger or of good people. Isn't she? It was not in 1856, two years after the addition, that Teissier wrote in the latest approved Manual that, for the true mason, Were divinity and nature synonymous? "Our predecessors adopted two formulas with which all the Men of goodwill can agree: God, the great architect to accept for the God he reveres, even those who do not believe in God (Vol. IV, p. 697).

And amidst the discussions raised by the proposal of Congress of the lodges of Metz, the same newspaper published a work where we read the following statements:

"Freemasonry is progress in all its forms..."
in all branches of human activity. It teaches us that there is only one religion, a true one, and therefore only one natural, the cult of humanity. For, my brothers, this mystery, this abstraction which, erected into a system, has served to form all religions, God, is nothing other than the sum of all our highest instincts to which, detaching from ourselves what was noblest within us, We have given a body, a distinct existence; this God is not in – so that the product of a generous, but erroneous, conception of humanity, which has stripped itself bare for the sake of a chimera. They replaced it with this statement:

This decision has sparked numerous protests. Some saw this measure as imprudent; that's what was being said to convention of 1876, when the discussion first took place there Mr. Massicault, the speaker of Masonic opportunism.

"The abolition of this article would result in a serious disruption" in the lodges; nothing excites minds like these discussions sterile discussions on the root causes, which have been going on for some time now. Two thousand years, without achieving any results... we should have let things take their time and wait for the next day when Freemasonry could, without fear of disorganization, remove the contrary dogmatic declaration to the logic of the friends of freedom of conscience (1). »

Others felt a sincere emotion upon seeing disappear thus the temple's frontispiece, the last mention of this God that the Freemasonry was a disguise, but they never stopped believing in it. The logical consequences of the false principles on which they what they had lived in for many years horrified them.

This feeling was very strong in the Masonic lodges of An-England and the United States, which have since broken off relations tions with the Grand Orient of France and the lodges of its obedience.

Free from all compromise with a positive church, Freemasonry is in religion a supremely free institute that seeks what are the relationship between human consciousness and the supreme principle of reality of life to find in it, as far as possible, the basis for authentic of all holy worship and all pious gratitude; because it is only in this way that one should be either a holy atheist or virtuously deistic, without prejudice, without dogma, without idolatry, without superstition of any kind (1).

In Germany, atheism has long reigned in the most of the lodges, while retaining, as a police measure, some formulas that are more or less Christian. Bishop de Ketteler states that, In many lodges, the Bible is replaced by a book com made of white sheets with this inscription: god (2). The following was read in the December 15, 1866 issue of Freimaurer-Zeitung, the secret journal of the lodges, written by Pastor Zille, director of the Protestant gymnasium in Leipzig:

"In a reading on the religious element of Freemasonry, Done on June 28, 1866, at the meeting of the association of the Francs - German-American Freemasons, Brother Charles de Gagera made the declarations the following rations, promising to have his speech printed: I am firmly convinced that the time will come and must come when atheism will be the general opinion of all humanity, and where the latter considers - will dismiss deism as a past phase, just like the Freemasons Deists are above religious divisions. XV. – Freemasonry and positivism.

Since then, the movement has only intensified.

In 1876, the lodge "La Clémence Amitié" in Paris, at the instigation of F.*. Cousin, vice-president of the council of the Grand Orient, has Messrs. Littré and Wyruboff were solemnly received into its fold, the current representatives of positivism. This reception has not been an ordinary fact: they wanted to emphasize that the Freemasons had not adopted the entire positivist doctrine, that is to say the elimination of the radical rejection of any idea of morality, of any fact that cannot be expressed or experienced through the senses, that is to say, the most brutal materialism.

Each year the lodge "La Clémence Amitié" celebrates the anniversary of this event with a special party, and here are some examples. In terms of its importance, it was celebrated in 1877 by a speaker authorized above all others, F.*. Jules Ferry, currently Minister of Public Education.

"If positivism has made its way into Freemasonry, it is because Freemasonry had long been positivist without knowing it.

For Fraternity is something superior to all dogmas, to all metaphysical conceptions, not only to all the religions, but to all philosophies. This means that sociability, which is nothing other than the scientific name for sociability, is capable of being self-sufficient; this means that social morality has its guarantees, its roots in human consciousness, that it can live alone, that she can finally throw away her theological crutches and march freely, to the conquest of the world.

"You are one of the most valuable instruments for this culture of social sentiment, for this development of social and secular morality"

"I believe it is essential to our institution to free the man of the fear of death, because of this age-old terror, to this servitude most difficult to reject, you oppose the feeling of fortitude and comforting of the continuity and perfectibility of the species"

"Then we feel an integral part of this great Being that cannot perish,"

Many Belgian lodges, for their part, have on several occasions, proclaimed in recent years their adherence to positivism.

In Italy, F.-. Mauro Macchi, a member of the Italian Parliament, member of the supreme council, wrote in the Masonic Review
February 16, 1874:

"The keystone of the entire system opposed to Freemasonry was
"and is the ascetic and transcendental feeling that carries men away"
"My beyond this life and makes them look at themselves"

"This system will not have been destroyed by the gavel of Freemasonry," "we will have a society made up of poor, deceived creatures who
"sacrifice everything to obtain happiness in a future existence" (2).

This, then, is the final word of Freemasonry: nothing beyond.

The man completely free of God and all fear of

In short, this is the dogma and morality of Freemasonry.

Destructive Freemasonry

OF ALL MORALITY

I. – Moral principles established in Masonic degrees

Can there be any morality or any rule of conduct?
without dogma, without a personal God, without religion and without religion true, that is to say, revealed by God?

Secret societies, by rejecting and working to destroy in minds and hearts, God, the afterlife, all positive religions tive and revealed, therefore essentially overturn all obligatory law gatoire, all morality, all social bond. This principle would therefore suffice. to show what Masonic morality can be. But so much so Clouds have been piled up; so many hypocritical precautions have were taken to conceal this truth from view; all the societies secret societies affect so much by repeating words of morality, virtue, that we are indeed forced, in order to unmask them, to remind them of their principles, their teachings, and their most undeniable actions

We have done on Masonic works, said Mr. Ragon, the inter-authorized priest of the Grand Orient, this recapitulation of which the laco-

The laconic nature of this recapitulation, by never formulating, in not even indicating what this moral is, leaves the follower or the uninitiated in complete darkness; but on this level, and After the interpretations authorized by the Grand Orient, nothing is easier than reaching the light.

What is the first moral lesson taught by the first grade?

purely moral. The regeneration of the original equality is one of the principles fundamentals of its institution and its indestructible principle (2).

"To erase all traces of distinction among men," he also said the master in all degrees, the officer of the Grand Orient Glavel, that is the the great work undertaken by Freemasonry (3).

"Equality," said Bazot, secretary of the Grand Orient, in turn, "is to give him sustained activity, which the Freemason was pleased to to recognize as one of its principal virtues (4).

"Equality and liberty," the Freemason speaker also said, "are Two inseparable sisters, daughters of nature and mothers of virtue. Equality Outlawed, liberty follows her into exile; reason and truth form their procession, and all that remains for sad humanity is oppression and the error from which all evils proceed... Equality! Liberty! May these Sacred words, let them be our rallying cry * Let us remember that there is no more of Freemasons where there is no longer either liberty or equality (5). »

They still propagate Enlightenment, Carbonara, the Templar rite, Martinism, Fourier, Saint-Simon, and their latest offshoot, the International national. This is how the Albigensians taught and practiced it, the Cathars, Mani, and Gnosticism. And like Freemasonry in 1789 'triumphant made it the basis of the rights and duties of man and from the citizen, let us pause for a few moments to extract, to the help of the stonemason's jewel, logic, the obvious and irrefutable consequences.

"Men are born and remain free and equal in rights. The first of these essential, imprescriptible, natural rights, are equality and liberty (1).

Therefore, man, taken individually or collectively, has no right to impose a law, or an obligation, on one or more gentlemen. Therefore, no man, Freemason or layman, Grand Orient, supreme council, or supreme power, does not have the the right to interpret nature in general and the nature of man in particular, and to derive laws or doctrines from it for the purposes of to pose to other men; and whoever else, even if he were hiero- Phante, makes the god of the Freemasons speak, Isis, Pan, Fire or any other principle, good or bad, is an imposter (2), natural to man and citizen. This is a principle proclaimed in choir by Freemasonry and, at its head or following it, by the philosophers.

Therefore, since it is of the nature and essence of man to be free and equal to other men, and that this right is inalienable and imprescriptible, no man can relinquish his right to one or more men, without going against nature, without such a pact or contract being entirely null and void. This consequence is not only acknowledged, but proclaimed as a principle by St-Martin (3).

Therefore, it is of nature, of the very essence of man and of the citizen, to receive no law, to admit no treaty, no commitment, nothing that binds or obliges him, that makes him do-lessons, the very first Venerable Master and founder of the lodge who bore his name, thus express themselves in their System of the nature:

"If man, according to his nature, is forced to love his being-bond, he is forced to love the means. It would be useless and perhaps unfair to demand to command a man to be virtuous, if he cannot be so without surrendering unhappily. As soon as vice makes him happy, he must love vice (1). a

"Let us broaden," concludes the Code of Nature, attributed to Diderot, but which belongs to another Venerable Master of the lodge, let us expand the narrow enclosure of our being, which moralists seem intent on shrinking... It is on the physical senses that the divinity constructs and governs the world moral. It is to these laws that you must abandon the disciple you wish to train. Pass to virtue. Now, we must, in order to put ourselves promptly and effectively to be in a state to obey these laws, let this sensitivity first make us, without deliberation, without examination, to refer everything back to ourselves, and to feel that everything is done for us, and that without us everything would be useless (2).

"Morality can be nothing other than the art of living happily" in this world... The science of morals must be drawn from the earth and not in the heavens, say Diderot, Raynal and Helvétius together; tomorrow every time we want to take the trouble to break down the feeling. However vague the love of happiness may be, one will always find physical pleasure. It is at the bottom of the crucible. It is always to the pleasure of the senses that he returns (3).

Let's listen to Voltaire again:

Pleasure is the object, the duty, and the goal.
Of all rational beings;

Love is made for your fellow human beings;

The prudens salute.

That all your hope is founded on pleasure,

Come, if there is a God, his tranquil power

Everyone knows or has heard of the Free Woman of Saint-Simonianism; it is one of the branches of communism. As for Fourier, he speaks of morality like Voltaire:

"True happiness for both of them consists only in satisfying their passions... All these philosophical whims, he adds, called duties, have no relation to nature; duty comes from men; attraction comes from God. We must study Vattraction, nature alone without any one meaning of duty (2).

content to pass on the general practice to the generations future, and to prepare them for it by popularizing its maxims:

"The doctrines of the moralists," the new editors of the founder's doctrines are merely methods for to achieve social good. Fourier criticized those of the past; why To make him a crime for it? As for the master's amorous customs, that's "Again, it's a question of method." – "And in this system," said Victor Considering that men are constantly bombarded by a crowd of attractive pleasures and work; they are spoiled for choice; Because they love variety, they frequently switch from one from one object to another, and successively enjoy all the physical pleasures moral and intellectual capacities reserved for human nature (1).

So, everything we call morals, good morals, morality In reality, in Masonic morality, it is left to the arbitrary decision of each one, and even the most monstrous immoralities are themselves it's simply a matter of method.

When his senses have difficulty or of pleasure, isn't it easy for him to see that it wasn't he who experienced this pain and this pleasure (2)?

It is the body, it is matter; now, as we have demonstrated as discussed in the previous chapter, the body or matter in the doctrines clearly professed by Saint-Martin, that's zero, that is nothing! What wider door could be opened to all the infamies and all crimes?

"The Holy Spirit, represented by the dove," said the hierophant explanatory Masonic symbols in the degree of Knight of the Sun, represented feel the image of our soul, which, being a breath of the Supreme Being, cannot be defiled by bodily works, and is always ready to to revolve in its entirety, of which it is only a part... The flame, which crosses the globe, represents the usefulness of the passions necessary for man in the short space of life, just as water is useful to the earth to make it to bear fruit (1).

"When we want to have an idea of the Divine, let us say that the Nature is God, proclaims the brother from the Liège lodge in turn, that we have already mentioned; let us say that this nature contains everything that we can know... It is by a law of nature that the sun illuminates the earth, while fire disrupts plants and animals, that the smoke, producing vapors, which condense above our heads, rises and finally falls back down as rain and frost. The only exposition of Masonic principles, admitted by the Grand Orient, therefore, demonstrates that there is not and cannot be more there to be reciprocal duties of men towards each other, or of man towards his fellow men, that there are none and that there cannot be any to have towards himself and towards God.

Thus, from one end of the Masonic lodge to the other, the tenelwes, shadow, dissimulation and lies, hypocrisy and carnage lomnie, are on the agenda.

Hence the contradictions in the rites and their various degrees, the ambiguities, the allegories, and their conflicting explanations with every step.

One of the most learned Freemasons, F. Delaunay, agrees with this in these terms, and this is the conclusion of his Tiler of the 33rd degree of words on every page, and the ceaseless work of doctrines and facts which constantly tend to annihilate them all; hence these toasts, these cheers, these songs and these slogans in honor the father of kings and magistrates, and the flagrant conspiracy doctrines, ranks and their allegories which puts everything into work to overthrow them; hence the affected repetition everywhere of words of virtue and morality, and of facts and teachings which they will amount to nothing less than the destruction of all morality and all virtue.

Hence the apotheosis of the fatherland and nationalities, and of the principalities, the necessary consequence of which is to wipe the slate clean of all nationality and of any homeland.

From this practical necessity of lying, hypocrisy, and slander, as Masonic virtues, when they can be useful to the sect or its members, follows in the treatises, in the contracts, in associations, in the whole commerce of life, the absence, the radical destruction of all good faith and all probity.

"What does the public care about the probity of an individual?" said one of the most Brilliant lights of Freemasonry, Helvetius? This probity is of little or no use to him. SECRET SOCIETIES AND MORALITY

"All affections are self-interested," they frequently say, in their lessons, the masons professors Cousin and Damiron; Self-love is necessary for every kind of affection; it is the principle...; it engenders and produces it; it determines it in all its trends, pushing it to all degrees, in fact all the characters, constitutes all the phenomena... For an existence foreign to self, for a non-self, a being full of solicitude, of interest and love, is an absurd hypothesis (1).

Also, another teacher of the kid Mr. Charma, school, is he not afraid to proclaim, in a work which he titles: Essay on the Foundations of Morality, "that at the place of selfishness that confesses itself, we have nothing to guide us Today, it's either sympathy or selfishness in disguise.

The ideologue Dcstutt de Tracy, another Freemason philosopher, in his profound ignorance of Christianity, whose first law is the sacrifice, dare to say, going even further than the others:

"As no authority can impose itself on me when it is Contrary to what one might think, I would naively say that forgetting the first The conditions of our being are found in the much-vaunted precept: Love treat your neighbor as yourself. This maxim clearly demonstrates the most important principle based on ignorance of human nature (2).

Also, "the motives that the morality of natural law employs," says also the great orator of the Liège lodge already mentioned, are the in- the interest of every man, of every society, of all humanity, in all times, places and circumstances (3)," but it is at judgment of the leaders of secret societies to which he rightly belongs It's tense to decide.

Among the obligations of neophytes and initiates, Master Ra- Gon returns twice, and in absolute terms, to the topic of obedience: "Let us obey the leader... Let man, in his summer, know how to..." After the carnage, he coldly resumed his work of socialist destruction.

Mazzini's assassinations are nothing other than the execution tion of Masonic oaths. They have always been in the lodge practice.

In 1827, in the United States, a journalist named Morgan, having Having entered a lodge, he had published its secrets; he was thrown into Lake Erie, after being horribly mutilated. The judges of the dispute trict members who belonged to the lodge refused to pursue the guilty, and the scandal was such that an anti-Masonic party so formed in the State of New York, its members having the aim to exclude from public functions any individual affiliated with lodges (1).

A striking example of what Freemasonry can do, even on its highest dignitaries, was given a few years ago in Italy. Here it is as reported by the Florence Journal November 1874:

"The Grand Orient of Rome circulated it with lightning speed" the formal order to all revolutionary press outlets not to elaborate too much in detail by relating the case of madness that has just afflicted Mr. Frapolli, one of its most prominent members.

CHAPTER FOUR

DESTRUCTIVE FREEMASONRY OF THE FAMILY

I. – General principles and teachings.

Man did not make himself; he belongs to the One who who created it and who maintains it at all times. He therefore cannot legitimately dispose of one's body and limbs, as well as his soul and his faculties, only according to the orders and will of God, who made him what he is.

"Now God, from the beginning," says the first of the books and all the ancient traditions, created him male and female: he made one woman for one man; and he said that the man would leave his father and mother, if necessary, to become attached to the woman he would have taken as his wife; that he would be one with her, and that man would not separate what God had thus united. He then forbade free men and women to to commit fornication; to the married man and woman of commit adultery, as well as, in their intimate relationships, any act contrary to the purpose of their union. He forbade some and to others to desire the wife or daughter, the husband or son of their kind, and, under penalty of eternal death, every species of immodesty.

If one is willing to reflect on the essential conditions of the family, on the roughly constant equality, with regard to number, of man and woman, on the long necessities of the en and almost always reciprocal between spouses, children, and fathers and mothers, one is soon convinced of the necessity of marriage.

Iod the revelation, and of all that is profoundly true and and the new law.

However, when, on the other hand, one travels, after the decline, the annals of humankind, let us question the customs of peoples, let us plumb the vast abysses of their lusts and sensitive appetites, all the furies so impetuous and yet so changeable are the passions of the flesh, and which we recall. Closely related to this shameful picture are the duties imposed by the family, as revelation has made it, as nature and true civilization. When the demand for it is met, we recoil in horror and with hearts full of anxiety. goisses; one is tempted to say with the disciples of Christ, or with Their Master: Is it beneficial to get married, and how is it. Is it possible not to do it?

Then appears the benevolence of the savior Jesus and the omnipotence the power of his mercy, raising up humanity through baptism his downfall; uniting, by an ineffable sacrament of love, his virginal flesh to our corrupted flesh, to cleanse and subdue it to the soul; attaching grace and help, a grace and a help as gentle as they are effective, to the first law of the world, to the foundation from the family, to the marriage itself, elevating it to the dignity of another sacrament, whose specific virtue is to sanctify the union of man and woman, and the family which should be their consequence sequence; finally giving him as a model his own union with the Church, a mysterious, sublime, eternal, and constantly imbued union. Molante, constantly holy in inexhaustible fertility.

The man, having thus become a Christian, was gently brought back to primitive laws of its creation; it is a new being with limits of the old world, and in which the soul and reason rule, and the body and senses obey. The spouses are worthy of one another. woman is restored to the primitive status of equality and love for which she had been created; man to that of dignity and tenderness. The respect that his title of head of the family gives him, in principle and as God's representative; the children, purified by the same means. enrich, develop and strengthen, in admirable unity of customs, beliefs and free virtues, the great societies that we call peoples or nations.

All the elements of the family, as we have just seen from lcsi to expose everything that constitutes it: marriage, monogamy, indissoluble. Lust by anything other than death, subordination of spouses as well as those of parents and children, therefore have their root and their principle in revealed religion.

But Freemasonry not only destroys the religion revealed not only the natural order itself, but also the natural order itself, by positing as a principle that man has no other end than himself, and that morality... insists on the satisfaction given with full license to all instincts.

Listen instead to a famous mason, Mr. Thiers, posing, in his The Book of Property, the purported foundation of human rights:

"Man has in his personal faculties a primary property undeniable, origin of all the others. The first of my properties, that's me, myself. My feet, my hands, my arms, my body, My mind is mine, undeniably mine.

Hence, logic effortlessly concludes: therefore all men and each man in particular has the indisputable property, subjective, inalienable from their bodies and limbs, from their mind and their faculties; therefore they have the right to dispose of them as their undeniable property, and one cannot dispose of it despite themselves, without violence and without injustice.

So suicide, prostitution, promiscuity, polygamy! even polyandry, as Mr. Laroque, another celebrity, says state education. in his Course of Philosophy for the use of youth; therefore, association contracts with whomever seems good, for the number and quality, and the conditions of revocability' and the right to divorce that each party may choose to impose, are a natural right. real, inalienable, and that no one, government or state, can to limit without tyranny; therefore each, having ownership of his own person, and of all his faculties, has the right to employ them in teaching to deny this hideous communism through words and the press God, to attack his worship, to tear out hearts, under the name of superstition, all beliefs and all morals; the first of rights, It is atheism, it is the right to deny all rights; and the most

An important consequence of this is the abolition of marriage. the sovereignty of inclinations, the emancipation and freedom of the pleasure.

What then becomes of marriage itself? A source of oppression, a slavery against which insurrection, resistance tance, are the most sacred of duties. And what becomes of the children? Children? But aren't they part of humanity? necessarily included under the name of men? They are therefore, Like everyone else, free and equal in rights? Yes, when they They are even born. But one must be born, and if it matters to rights of men and women, to their equality, to the freedom of their inclinations and their pleasures, to their hatred of slavery, to the love of their comforts and conveniences that these children do not They are not born, who will have the right to force them to be born, to let them live, not smother or murder them in the womb even from the mother, or not to throw them in the trash? But, line times born, protected by the pleasure or calculation of their parents, how many then come the duties of these children, their equals from birth, free also like them? What becomes of the right to command and The duty to obey in the face of common equality and freedom?

And like absolute anarchy, primitive freedom and equality that Weishaupt, Saint-Martin, Proudhon and Bakunin dream of, are absolutely impossible, which men need to make a rule all the more harsh because they have shaken off the yoke of the law of God, the State alone will become the absolute master of the family. "We have looked at paternal tenderness," says the Universal Morality of Diderot, etc., as an innate feeling that was inherent to blood. The slightest reflection would have been enough to dispel this misconception. "Deemed so flattering."

"Children's love for their father is not such a huge obligation" general, says the encyclopedist Toussaint: if one must take into account his father From the supposed benefit of birth, we will therefore owe him actions of thanks for the delicious food he was served, for the champagne that he drank, for the minuets he was kind enough to dance (2).

"The father's authority over children," Diderot said in turn, "is not "This idea is based on the advantages it is supposed to provide them." – "This Authority, Raynald adds, vanishes the moment children can to provide for themselves (3). »>

"It is a constant," d'Alembert also said, "that the submission of the children should only take place for the time when they are in the state of ignorance and drunkenness (4). »

Here is one of those hymns:

1. Dear sisters, must we commit a crime against you?
The first cult offered to beauty?

A pure breath produces and animates man.

He believes he sees divinity in you.

Dear sisters, could the man have done it without crime?
To be insensitive to the feet of beauty?

2. Dear sisters, in this pious homage
All of Adam's sons were fervent;

Through them this cult has been passed down from age to age.

They gave him their most charming moments.

Dear sisters, in this pious homage
We pride ourselves, like them, on being ardent.

3. Dear sisters, throughout all nature
They wanted to erect altars for you;

Among humans, deprived of art and culture.

You receive natural tributes.

Dear sisters, throughout all nature

Who better than us can praise your altars?

Thus the original fall, the cause of all calamities of world, ridiculed by the grossest impiety, travels tied by the license in the work of the flesh, although this work was commanded by God himself to the spouses from their creation for the multiplication and preservation of the human species, but praised and encouraged as promiscuity, and drowned in the ivresse by the most shameless libertinage: that is one of the hymns of Masonic temples and one of the signs of the respect shown there to religion. And so that no one might imagine, by the date of the Manual from which it is derived, that this supposed hymn was only suitable for lodges of that time, here is the one that F.*. That would be a very stupid joke, full of contradictions and fundamental tenets of our faith, and disgusting ambiguities of immorality for any honest woman who has the Manichean definition of Freemasonry.

What could be more unhealthy, indeed, than all these symbols with a double meaning? What a meaning! What is this perfect friendship which has as its symbol a garter, requested by a venerable man on behalf of all the men whom he presides over, a woman's garter, which receives in exchange, on behalf of all these men, another garter with which she must sleep with the first night. The communism of Saint-Simon was more forthright about it.

The oath is no longer merely impious, but of the utmost imperiousness. Morality, destroyer of marriage and family. It is so same as the explanation given for the password: Lamma Sabactani> which means: "Lord, I have only sinned because you have..." "Vez abandoned."

To blame God for his faults and his greatest crimes himself, fatalism, radical destruction of all morality and all virtue! and the sacred word is Balba, "an anagram of Babel, which signifies confusion, anarchy, nothing is certain anymore.

This is a plan that has been followed everywhere, together.

At the general assembly of the Italian symbolic lodges, held In Milan in February 1877, it was decided: 1° the founding of a newspaper weekly, Famiglia and Scuola, intended to dispel the prejudices of families and to make them adopt the principles of the Freemasonry; 2° the establishment of Sunday circles in substituted form. tuition of those supported by the priests. But the lodges do not have for this renounced the corruption of morals, which Weishaupt and Ca-Gliostro erected as means of propaganda, and their members are the propagators of the Malthusian league (see attached document C). 1

Not only are the authors of these proposals frank-Freemasons, but the lodges themselves, as a body, dear they are trying to prepare public opinion in this direction.

Thus, in Masonic marriage, introduced from a certain point several years in the lodges to replace, after the civil marriage, religious marriage, or rather the sacrament of the Church, the following dialogue, reported by Master Ragon, is pledge between the Worshipful Master and the Senior Warden, opposite the new spouses:

"-What do you think," the venerable man asked, "of the indissolubility of the marriage ?

"- That it is contrary to the laws of nature and reason: to the laws of nature, because social conventions have often united beings that nature had separated by antipathies that only reveal themselves through marriage; according to the laws of reason, because indissolubility makes a law of love and claims to enslave the most capricious and the most in voluntary expression of feelings.

"- And what should the corrective be?"

"- Divorce; it is part of our customs until it is in our laws and become legal.

During this speech, the brothers all had their heads bowed, but at the end They watch the first general, who makes the movement with his sword which signifies liberty, which all having imitated, the sovereign pronounces that captivity end. In the practical manual of 1845, it is the great Master of the palace, Daniel, who, when questioned privately, as having Having received the gift of interpreting dreams, he replies that the voice heard is that of the great architect of the universe or of the God of Nature, and that the lion ready to devour the sovereigns, foreshadowing the end that awaits them, if they make them deaf to the voice of the great architect.

– What favor do you have to ask of me? – That, under the favor From the great architect of the universe, the king's justice grants us freedom and that he may allow us to go and rebuild the temple of our God.

– Since such just motives lead him here, that of freedom of to appear before us, with his face uncovered, may it be granted to him.

The guards open the door, bring the recipient to the west tooth and make him prostrate.

– The sovereign: Zorobabel, I felt, as you did, the weight of your captivity; I am ready to deliver you from it, by granting you the freedom at this moment, if you wish to share with me the secrets of the Ma-stupidity for which I have always had the deepest veneration.

– The recipient: Sovereign master, when Solomon told us He laid down the first principles, he taught us that equality should be the first motive. She does not reign here. Moreover, our external marks Our secrets are unknown to you, and I cannot reveal them to you. My freedom comes at this price; I prefer captivity.

– The sovereign: I admire Zerubbabel's discretion and virtue; he He deserves freedom for his steadfastness in his commitments.

The brothers nodded, lowering the tips of their swords and the relevant. The sovereign strikes seven times, which serve as a signal to the gen negotiators to remove the captive's chains; then the sovereign told him, "Go away your country; I allow you to rebuild the temple destroyed by my ancestors – very; may your treasures be returned to you before sunset; be recognized as leader over your equals; I will order that you be obeyed in all things at the place of your passage, may you be given all aid and assistance as to myself.

Having thus become free, the supposed Zorobabel receives from the venerable representative equals, and is created a knight of the sword. Cyrus then gives him a tablier and a green cord, which are the decorations he instituted for the princes of his court, like Freemasonry.

Zorobabel withdraws, arrives at the bridge; armed guards arrest him there; aided by the people Cyrus had given him to accompany him, he puts on the sword by hand and opens a passage amidst the corpses we have seen to be rolled with debris of all kinds. He loses only there lying about its decorations.

It is an allegory of glorious days, past and present and future, undertaken and conducted by the leaders of Freemasonry laughter, and the Staburzanaï river is no longer fiction, it is the river of the Revolution which has left and continues to leave so many corpses, sad remnants of everything that attempts to oppose progress masonic.

The mason Zorobabel thus arrives, with those who helped him to to conquer, among his brothers the completely free masons, or in the second apartment. The brothers and friends from the first apartment had become, By changing costumes, the extras in the second film; they represent "They feel," says the Practical Manual, "the masons who remained among the ruins" born of Jerusalem and the First Temple. In this apartment There is no longer a throne, but simply a seat.

The recipient undergoes a second interrogation, where he recounts all of the above. The president, who now goes by the very-illustrious master, replies to him: "My brothers, the pearl that you have Made of princely decorations, it announces to you that justice our brotherhood cannot tolerate the triumph of pomp and greatness. "When in the same person or in the same body of Legislature, proclaimed Montesquieu, legislative power is Combined with executive power, there is no freedom, because that one might fear that the same monarch or the senate might do tyrannical laws to be executed tyrannically." He espoused the same doctrine on the union of judicial power and legislative or executive, thus branding, as tyrants, all the most great kings of antiquity, and in our country, in particular, Charlemagne, Saint Louis and Louis XII. He added further in The Spirit of the Laws:

"Erase in every free state every man who is supposed to have a soul" A free people must be governed by themselves; the people as a body had legislative power; but as this is impossible in the large states and is subject to many disadvantages in small ones, it The people must do through their representatives everything that they cannot do themselves to do it himself.

"If the legislative power decrees, not from year to year, but forever, on the raising of public funds, she runs the risk of losing her freedom, because the executive power will no longer depend on her. He is the same if it rules, not on a yearly basis, but for all days, on the land and sea forces that it must entrust to the power executor (2).

J.-J. Rousseau drew logical consequences from these principles:

"We no longer ask who has the right to make laws, since they are the expression of the general will... The power The legislative process belongs to the people and can only belong to them... This that a man, whoever he may be, orders on his own authority is not law; for the people subject to the laws must be its author.

But let's look at the theory in more detail and with even greater emphasis. and the implementation of everything together in Carbonarism.

Freemasonry. – Carbonari.

In the following book, we will show how from 1815 to 1830^{1a} The Italian and French Carbonari recruited in the Masonic lodges and used them as a base of operations. In this chapter, it suffices for us to cite the ritual used in sales; we will see how, in a different form, to approach prayer to the religious beliefs and patriotic sentiments of Italians of that era, this sect reproduced doctrines policies identical to those of Wcishaupt and Saint-Martin. These doctrines go far beyond the liberation of Italy and the establishment of the constitutional monarchy.

Let us only discuss the sale of the third grade or the grand elected, as stipulated by the Carbonara's own constitution:

"The vendilla takes place in a dark, hidden cave, unknown to men other than the grand masters of the Carbonari, already received grand elected officials. Two guardians, called flames, are placed at two sides of the door with two swords made like flames of fire. The interior layout of the vendita is the same as in the apprentice vendites, for the benches of the good cousins, the place of the assistants, who, in this rank, are called, the first, sun, the second, moon, or the first and second, scouts... All the men, obeying the simple laws of nature, they were good, virtuous and servants. All their virtues had no other aim than to excel in the exercise of charity. The land, without particular owners, provided abundantly what was needed by all those who cultivated it. The needs were moderate: fruits, roots, pure water, were sufficient for the subsistence of the men and their companions. First they covered themselves with the rent of foliage, then, when they had realized, by corrupting themselves, of the need to wage war on the innocent creatures over whom they arrogated power. Then came the right of life and death; the skins of animals were used to clothe them. This first lapse in humanity soon destroyed the general brotherhood and primitive peace (1).

“Hatred, jealousy, ambition, seized the hearts of men. My. But at the same time, it is the rule which harmonizes all these rights, subordinates them in case of conflict; She is the limit of all these authorities, which are merely a reflection of the sovereign power of the only true master and father that Christians worship in heaven: Non est potestas nisi a Deo.

Secret societies overthrow all of this order.

Every man is absolutely free, absolutely equal, he is King, he is a priest.

This idea would be understandable, at a stretch, if he could live absolutely isolated; but as the necessities of its physical nature that morality and connection bring him into contact with his peers, he will enter inevitably in conflict with them, and what rule then will reconcile them? These absolute equalities, these sovereign freedoms?

Force alone, whether brute force or hypocritical force.

A writer, who represented at the Convention, among the Girondins, the most advanced group of secret societies, Brissot de Warville did not back down from the extreme consequences of this conception of law as taught by the lodges:

"The measure of our needs should be that of our wealth; and if Forty crowns are enough to preserve our existence, to possess Two hundred thousand crowns is blatant theft, an injustice. The property Exclusivity is a true crime in nature. The need is the only title to our property. It follows from these principles that when it is satisfied, man is no longer the owner... Our social institutions They abolish theft, a virtuous action commanded by nature itself. Depraved people, you bought, paid for, you say, your properties? You poor thing!... Brissot de Warville was simply logical, and despite the contradictions sayings to which, fortunately, in practice, the strength of things, that is to say the natural order of creation, leads men my most perverse, the same mother thought continues to animate the secret societies.

We saw above how Saint-Martin and Illuminism of Weishaupt posits the absolute right of the initiate, of the man of science, to govern his fellow men, and to govern them in a absolutely.

This was already the fundamental tenet of Gnosticism, and the Ma-Stupidity has remained faithful to it:

This is the core idea of Saint-Simonianism, which dreamed of the restoration ratio of ancient despotisms, by wanting to bring together in the hands of the same men the spiritual power, and the civil power, that distinguished Catholicism. And Félix Pyat, in 1849, still said that the Republic has both powers, both swords, because that it derives from the sovereignty of the people!

Therefore, we should not be surprised to see secret societies, by wherever they manage to seize power, destroy all the practical and concrete freedoms, breaking down communal entities and provincial foundations based on history and traditions, abolish the foundations public utility donations and autonomous corporations, destroy laws protecting property, even at the expense of the classes of peasants, and subject the soil of the homeland to a pulverization laughable, to a continuous work of fragmentation, of reconstruction painful and leading to judicial liquidation.

The first dictator became their only god: such is the goal of societies secrets.

But while the French practice platonic cosmopolitanism and spread ideas of which they are the first victims, Germans use these ideas as a tool for reign.

From this point of view, it is worthwhile to dwell on the works by Mr. Bluntschli, a Freemason of the highest ranks, The General Theory of the State, Politics, the Law of Nations which are translated into almost every language and give a good idea of the impetus that Freemasonry gives to the es- taken from schools where it dominates.

A long-time professor at the University of Heidelberg, Mr. Bluntschli is one of the men who, through their teachings and their writings contributed most to throwing the educated class into the paths of the Kulturkampf. As a member of the Chambers Prussian, he worked powerfully to prepare the reconciliation of the national-liberals with Mr. de Bismarck which were sealed by the events of 1866, as he himself has as told in his autobiography.

His Masonic activity was equal to his scientific activity. Great Master of the Grand Lodge (Grand Orient) of Bayreuth, he did not not happy to push South Germany into the arms of great Prussian Masonic empire; it still shines, in the care, in Switzerland, his native country, and he excites the Swiss lodges, like an avmt-garde, in the fight against Catholicism, while waiting to use them for the reunification of their homeland with Al-Magne (1).

Although Freemasonry is not mentioned in his works intended for the general public, knowledge of life the author's political stance is not useless for understanding certain aspects certain parts of his books that he left, not without purpose, in a sort of twilight.

Despite his seemingly very conservative appearance, Mr. Bluntschli poses very clearly, in his General Theory of the State, the conception of the modern state as being essentially human, that is to say, absolutely independent of divine law. Now, this

The exaltation of humanity independent of God is the very essence of the Masonic idea. It is to its realization that Mr. is working. Bluntschli, when he teaches in this book that the modern state The future must embrace all of humanity. He does not say here how This result will be obtained. More explicitly in a speech than he spoke in 1873, in Zurich, in front of the Modestia lodge, he sat recognized this great result as the goal to be achieved through efforts gatherings of Masonic lodges from all over the world.

OF THE PROPERTY

I. – The Masonic principle of independent humanity
THE LAW of God is incompatible with the right of property,

The divine constitution of the family calls for, as a consequent quence, the property.

God, as creator and preserver, sovereign and universal Master of the universe and all who inhabit it, – Domini is terra et plenitudo ejus, orbis terramm et omnes qui inhabitant in eo, – without ever being able to lose anything of this all-powerful and inalienable sovereignty, however, gave to man and to the family, after having created and constituted them, the right to inhabit ei- to fill the earth, the right to enjoy it and the duty to cultivate it, as well as dominion over the animals that inhabit it with him (1).

However, Freemasonry, by denying God or destroying the idea of the creation and sovereignty of the Creator, destroyed by this even the only solid basis for property rights.

human sound, of the absolute ownership that man has of his body and its faculties, as Mr. Thiers says in his book of Property. (Book I, Chapter IV, § 1.)

This work, so highly praised by all unprincipled conservatives, ultimately undermines the very principle of property rights.

firstly, by representing, contrary to the facts, the property rights ceremonies as the exact equivalent of labor incorporated into the soil, then by systematically disregarding the eminent domain God's, deprives human property of its sole title fully satisfactory according to reason and the law of moral use and in accordance with the general good which is binding on owners (1).

However, this idea of man being his end in himself with his two inalienable attributes, liberty and equality, necessarily exclude hereditary property as a right. Property cannot more than a fact of physical possession based on force current holder and must disappear with it.

We have already seen Weishaupt and the Freemason members the top Italian sales figures, in their attacks against gold to create companies, to fight against property using the same arguments private and civil authority.

But it is good to show how all the principles of the so-called Socialism necessarily stems from these premises; we will be less surprised to see communism celebrated in many rituals conical from the earliest grades and in all the authors appearing to the sect.

We will borrow this demonstration from Pachtler:

"Freedom, from the human point of view of the lodges, means the in complete and all-encompassing dependence of man on all legislators and all laws except man himself even, not only in the dogmatic order, but also in the moral order and consequently in the political and social order. The Decalogue is worth at best, even as a private satisfaction, granted to the individual who wants to observe it, but never as general law of humanity, because that would be a barrier to the

(I) Father Deschamps, in a very remarkable work, Communism and its causes, published in 1849 (Seguin, Avignon), demonstrated with the authority of a true philosopher, the fundamental flaw in Mr. Thiers' book. Since then, economic discussions The legal issues that have arisen regarding land ownership rights have left nothing behind to subsist on this much-vaunted book. It is now justly and completely It's quite outdated. Here's one of the strange philosophical maxims it contains: < Physical and moral faculties, the source of property rights, man it comes from God, from that God whom I shall name as you please: God, fate, chance, author, whoever he may be, author of things, letting them be or doing, suffering them or wanting them" (Book I, Chapter 6). One cannot be too astonished of the blindness with which too many Catholics became infatuated with This man, after 1848, earned him a reputation throughout the Empire as a conservator vateur, although he had never renounced any of his blasphemies, and finally delivered him France in 1871.

I, human. Man and humanity make of themselves laws with complete independence from everything, and do not address They feel no obligation to do so. On the contrary, they abhor it. like an usurpation. Thus falls the seventh commandment of God, and with him property. Like everything else, the property becomes an institution which, according to the free and independent The will of man is either established or overturned by law. And The pure reason of the atheist man will find it much more suitable capable of placing the common heritage of the State under the direction of the people and to assign to each individual, according to his work, his share in the jointly acquired property, thereby equalizing the pre-a tense accumulation of gold in the hands of the few, and the poverty of the enormous number, in other words, one will introduce the socialist people's state (der volkstaat).

Ten years ago, Bishop de Kettleler had already drawn this conclusion from premises of liberalism, when he wrote: "If the principles of the modern state, which disregards all religion and considers the denial of God as a right of intellectual culture, are true, so what the majority of Chambers decides is the right, and there can no longer be any question of an illegitimate enterprise of this will of the people against the right to property (1). »

"The consequence of the entire system (liberal, that is to say, human manufactory) is: A Chamber, and what this single Chamber ordains The law is given, and whoever, to resist it, relies on its conscience, on his faith, on the law transmitted, on Christ and God is guilty of high treason; he sins against majesty. of the popular will. But let us listen to the masters, authorized interpreters of the Grand Orient:

"I have just outlined in a short sketch," said Rédarès, "the two principals

And we can go a little further:

"These are the principles of true light, the sacred science that will serve had the intelligence of Solomon's and Hiram's workers; the demon of 3 Darkness destroyed their holy work, but the plan remained, the architect The supreme one has preserved it for the generation of the chosen; let us work on these Eternal foundations, let us restore to the symbolic temple its original beauty. Freemasonry is the regenerative myth of humanity, Yœuf where found contained within it the seed of social perfectibility....

"In our modern times," said Ragon, "the rank of apprentice acquired a greater degree of interest by presenting the iconic image of the principle of human societies.

The state of nature, the social state, these are the two general relationships, under the Which ones should we consider the human species... The trials of the first grades retrace all these vicissitudes. The man of nature is no more happy since other men, instead of cultivating the land, have been dispute possession, another interpretation of the word Tubalcain (1).

The ritual tells the aspirant that the apprentice password (Tu-Tubal) means: possession of the world. We know that Tubal can strongly to signify, in Hebrew, the habitable land, as Cain signifies possession.

Therefore, Ragon does not hesitate to assert a little further on, in his interpretation on the table lodge which follows the first three degrees, which, "in ancient times, each Masonic session was followed by a banquet, and that this custom of the primitive institution proves that the established community of property entailed that from the home, and this one, the use of a single table for everyone."

The Freemason philosophers of the 18th century had attacked which even more directly relates to the principle of property:

Robespierre will be even more explicit; he summarizes the question of property in four propositions, which he calls the truths on the subject matter:

"1° Property is the right that every citizen has to enjoy and dispose of to claim the portion of property guaranteed to him by law.

What law? The one that Freemasonry will make, when they are dissidents Let's dispel the prejudices on this subject!

Through this antagonism, through its universal character, this sect affects the counterfeit character of the Church and divine works and this characteristic is the essence of works inspired by the devil.

As we progress through modern times, Masonic documents are multiplying; the legends that will serve winds of patterns related to lodge rituals and which seem to relate to different layers, indicate the successive filiation by which the doctrines that serve as the basis for Franc-masonry techniques were used to reach the 18th century.

The external organization is that of the great guilds of masons, who, like that of the mercers, that of the Lombards for Merchants and bankers grouped together the craftsmen of building in different parts of Europe, thanks to the wide and

The legend of Hiram and Solomon's temple is perhaps contemporary with these corporations. But alongside it, we have we find others no less considerable, which are related to the destruction of the famous Order of the Knights Templar and are like a prolonged cry of vengeance against the ecclesiastical powers Sistics and civilians who had to destroy them. Mixed with these memories And to these rites, other signs, other ceremonies bring us back up to the great heresy of the Middle Ages, that of the Albigensians, of the Catarrhs, Patarins, and to their ancestors the Manicheans and the Gnostics.

Gnosticism, Manichaeism, the Albigensians, the Templars, such are the sources from which Freemasonry emerged (1).

Before showing how the Freemasons of the 16th century emerged from the ruins of the Order of the Temple, we will point out the identity of the doctrines of modern Freemasonry with all these heresies. One will thus be able to realize the for-

THE ORIGINS OF FREEMASONRY

II. – Gnosticism, the primary source of Freemasonry

"Only the enlightened ones," said Weishaupt in his inaugural address holding the rank of Scottish knight, are in possession of secrets of the true Freemason. 11. Even the enlightened ones still have a Many of its secrets are yet to be discovered. The new knight must devote his research to it. He is especially warned that it is through the study of the ancient Gnostics and the Manicheans that he will be able to make great discoveries about this truth Masonry table (1).

Ragon, in his Course of Initiation to Masonic Degrees, often also refers to the Gnostics and Gnosis to complement to clarify or better highlight the meaning of the rites or symbols. "At "In the middle of the blazing star," he said, referring to the rank of Fellow Craft, The letter G appears, emblem of the union of matter and spirit. Gnostics, knowers or clairvoyants, possessors of Gnosis or true science, also share the same initial letter. Then, at the Master's level: "The allegory of light and of darkness, which forms part of the foundation of mastery, has caused to describe the masons sometimes as Manicheans, sometimes as desp'is-Cillians, etc., or Gnostics (2). »

Clavel, in his Picturesque History of Freemasonry, in turn points out the identity of the doctrines of Gnosticism

The children of light were already peeling away.

F.*. Rédarès, in his Historical and Philosophical Studies on the three degrees of symbolic Freemasonry, he expresses Thus, regarding the Gnostics: »

And further on:

Gnosticism is a Renaissance thought, the scientific chain which links the old world of the elect with the new; and we must consider describing its philosophical and religious movement as the historical phase the most important toric of symbolic Freemasonry. I do not claim not to delve into the substance of the doctrines, to analyze the divisions and the subdivisions of Gnostic theology; I want to pass lightly over all These things, to show the perfect analogy that exists between belief, the rites and customs of Gnosticism and those of Freemasonry.

"The Gnostics believed in a general principle of love, in a life pervasive throughout all creation. From this fundamental principle it follows that the Gnostics had no other morality than that which nature has engraved in our consciousness, and which, born with the world, cannot perish than with him.

"Valentinian's school, which Tertullian calls the most fanatical and the the most numerous of the Gnostics, was at least the one that professed the most great wealth of doctrines. Eloquent and learned, he occupied a distinguished position. among the thinkers of the second century AD. In Egypt, in Rome, In Cyprus, everywhere he went to teach his doctrines, he gained disciples enthusiastic people. His disciples, under the name of Cainilians or Judaites, In their hatred of the demiurge, they went so far as to proclaim men the the most eminent of the ancient world, the patriarchs, the lawgivers and the prophets, enemies of the Supreme Being, instigators of the creation of the dd-Miurge and oppressors of the holy race of Gain, Abiran, and Judah. to lift from their condemnation the characters charged with the curse of all centuries; the Edinities have surpassed in this respect all others* very kinds of courage. For them, Cain, Gham, Esaii, the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, the children of Korah, Ulaan, and Abiram are from noble victims forming Sophia's true family, and as such opponents of pride and the bad institutions of the demiurge Jesus hova. They applied this point of view with unprecedented boldness.

vello and with an unalterable consequence to the entire history of the Mo-Seism. They took it further: they considered the gospels and the many Orthodox Christians view these works as tainted by Judaism, as well as the majority of the apostles. Judas, the only apostle who was a prophetic, knew perfectly well the state of affairs, the relationships of the upper world with the lower world, in short, the whole celestial gnosis; it was through this that he knew that the empire of Jehovah would be destroyed through the death of the Savior, and it is to bring about this result that he betrays him. They added that the Savior had only descended into limbo to free Cain, Judas, the sodomites etc.

"This shows that the Edinities were far from being enemies of Christianity; on the contrary, they claimed to be the true Christians and the best in every respect like all the others (1).

"Carpocrates follows Valentinus. His school consists of more doctrines" sharper than any other, even though they were cosmopolitan. She is not only anti-Jewish in the sense that it fights against the laws imperfect Mosaic law; it still proscribes all laws, it does not recognize that one, the law of nature. It has sometimes been referred to as the epithet of eclectic; she deserves it in some respects; she combines certain ideas from Platonism with some opinions from Christianity. Carpocrates, born in learned Alexandria, raised in Christianity, contemporary with Basilides, Valentinus, and all the leaders one of the most famous of the various Gnostic schools, could not fail to be a not very eclectic. He joined Christianity, to which he wanted to give the greater simplicity (?), the opinions of the East, such as the West had made them, and those of the West itself. No Gnostic sect no longer knows of any sources other than that of Carpocrates; none indicates better than she could access the sources she consulted. "A gnostic, a scholar, a child of light, an enlightened one" must know everything; for what merit is there in abstaining from something that that one does not know? Merit does not consist in abstaining from pleasures, but to use it as masters, to captivate pleasure under our dominion, even as she holds us in her arms; for me, that's how I use it, and I only kiss it to smother it (1).

who lived by the light diffused into the dark matter. Some Gospel texts interpreted as he saw fit, some reasoning ments borrowed from the Gnostics and philosophers on the tra- editions of Guebres or magistes, mixed and blended together, composed a body of doctrines.

"Like the Gnostics," said Mr. Matter, "he focused on sacred codes." Jews and Christians received a judgment of superior theosophy, and it was made codes according to his doctrine.... He understood revelation in the sense of broader and he attributed to the sages and prophets of paganism revelations so sublime that he preferred them to those of the Jews. He pros He condemned marriage while still allowing pleasures... The soul or the mother idea what animated his entire system was pantheism... The cause of all this that which exists, according to him, is in God; but God is in everything; all the souls are equal; God is in all; and this animation is not limited not in men and animals, it is the same in plants (1).

Thus the Manicheans, believing that the benevolent principle was that the light, and that this part of God abandoned to the Darkness was spread throughout all the bodies of heaven and earth, they said that she was a slave there and defiled; that some of these fragments of light would never be freed from this slavery and would remain bound for eternity with the es- I took darkness to a globe of darkness. The homicide and murder, by delivering God's portion from slavery wave or prison of the body and matter, child of darkness, could therefore become a pious and entirely meritorious work.

Jesus Christ was therefore not, could not be a savior*. His soul, like that of other beings, was only a portion of divine light, though more perfect. They maintained that his incarnation, his birth, his sufferings, his death, his resurrection His rise to power, his ascent, had been merely superficial. Consequently They rejected the Eucharist and the other sacraments and did not They paid no worship to either the Cross or the Virgin Mary. They... tended that the soul of Jesus Christ had reunited with the sun, and that those of the elect, after having purified themselves of their darkness by successive transfigurations into other bodies, passed into the stars, then in the moon, which in turn, when it is filled with them folds, and its entire surface is illuminated, the discharges between the arms of the sun. They also honored the sun and the stars, not only as the symbol of eternal light, but come to me the very substance of God.

To attract the remnants of Gnosticism, they repeated that all Religions and all sects were essentially the same. that they differed only in expressions and ceremonies, and that we all needed to unite in a common brotherhood.

They made an exception only for the Catholic religion, which they affected outwardly to believe and practice in all sorts of dissimulation, ambiguity, and hypocrisy, but of which in secretly, and amongst themselves they vehemently denounced dogmas and morality.

They even attacked the law of property, and taught, according to the testimony of Saint Epipbanus and of Saint Augustine, which one could not own outright or own sounds, nor fields, nor any riches whatsoever; not even magic was not foreign to them, for it is the natural consequence of the double principle (1).

They were also divided into three ranks: the believers, the elect, and perfect. These were impeccable and absolutely l bres, because there were no longer any binding laws for them and whose violation could make them guilty, as Saint attests Jerome. Each of them, moreover, was bound by the secrecy of his rank. by the most inviolable oath; swear, per swear, secretum prodere noli was one of their principles. They recognized themselves among they, as children of light and delivered from darkness, assured Saint Augustine and Saint Epiphanius also bear particular signs links: words and passwords; touching of hands and the breast; the latter, preserved by the Templars, was of such indecency that it was removed: Signa oris, manuum et sinus. Manichæorum alter alteri obviam factus, dexteram sibi ipsi signi causa, velut a tenebris servati (2). And like their calumnies against the Catholic religion, their aversion to the marriage and agriculture, the secret libertinism by which they women were led by corrupt morals, to which their principles obliged all sovereigns to defend power and society, and to crack down on them, they believed themselves permitted dissent manipulation, lying, perjury, false professions of faith, all kinds of deceit and profound hypocrisy.

"Their only law is lies, their only religion is the devil,"
"As a sacrifice, nothing but depravity."

Reflecting on our previous chapters, recognized in these principles the doctrines and identical practices of Freemasonry: pantheism at the heart of all systems; the dual principle of light and darkness, represented by the two columns Boaz and Jakin; the same praise for all sects and false religions; even

There are even ceremonies, decorations, and days dedicated to... words, symbols so particular to Manichaeism and to its author, whose tangible traces it is impossible to find wounded in Masonic lodges, without feeling seized by this resemblance. A physician, Manes had taken it upon himself to heal the son of King of Persia, provided that all other doctors were excluded; pursued by this prince for having let his son die, he fled; Arrested a little later, he was condemned to be skinned alive with reed tips. Scattered throughout the heart of France, these heretics received the name of Albigensians, from the city of Albi, where the first council was held who condemned them. Long before the civil authorities were forced to intervene to defend the threatened social order, They professed the doctrines of Manichaeism on the two principal cipes, attributing marriage and procreation to the evil principle children, and they taught, as the council of Tarragona, indicating this as a way to recognize them, that no obedience was owed to the authorities, whether ecclesiastical or otherwise questions, whether secular, and that no one had the right to punish by corporal punishment for any crime; finally, they hated the ministers of the Church and never ceased to denounce them; they vowed milks that they be pursued and exterminated like wolves; and wherever they were masters, they acted in this way, breaking and burning crosses, images, relics, pillaging and devastating churches and monasteries, sparing neither age nor sex, and bringing devastation, fire, and death everywhere.

It wasn't easy to wrest their secret from them, said another writer; they had a language full of ambiguities and artifice. These people practiced the adage of their ancestors, the Manicheans: Jura, per jura, secretum prodere noli: swear, perjure yourselves, but Keep it a secret. They didn't preach, said an ancient author who had been one of them, but they spoke in hushed tones; they were pleased in secluded places, and they murmured rather than explained. their doctrine. And Saint Bernard, after having said of these sectarians that they were not seeking to conquer, but to harm, and that they were covering themselves milks under the grass to bite and communicate more securely the venom, was not afraid to assert that the apparent austerities of their lives were nothing but hypocrisy, their piety, which concealed tion, and that their errors, mixed with the profound depravity of Their customs gave their sects all the characteristics of the mystic a realm of iniquity foretold by Saint Paul.

Moreover, it is not only Catholic authors who thus pointed out the Albigensian doctrines and customs, according to all the monuments of the time, the interrogations, the sentences and the minutes. Several writers of illustrious name in the Masonic annals have had the courage not to back down before such a striking truth, and here is how Mr. Michelet himself He speaks of the Albigensians in his History of France:

"The nobility of the south, which differed little from the bourgeoisie, was entirely composed of children of Jewish or Saracen women, people of good intellect different from the ignorant and pious chivalry of the north; it had for the to support and with great affection the mountain people. "Finally, this Judea of France, as Languedoc was called, it was not only reminiscent of the other by its asphalt and olive trees; it Sodom and Gomorrah also had them, and it was to be feared that the vengeance of The Church did not give him his Dead Sea. That Eastern beliefs, the dual Persianism, Manichaeism, and Gnosticism have penetrated this country, This will surprise no one. Every doctrine had taken root there; but Manichaeism, the most odious of all in the Christian world, makes us "Forget the others (1)."

Mr. Michelet speaks in roughly similar terms of Brabançons, and after saying: "Their doctors taught Aristotle aloud, the Arabs and the Jews quietly, with the pan-Theism of Averrhoes and the subtleties of the Kabbalah," he adds:

"Such is the intoxication and pride of the self upon its first awakening. By the Philosophy, through republicanism, attacks the non-word (that is to say God (in academic terms) in three forms; he breaks authority, he "tames nature." (Ibid. pp. 303-306.)

And here they are, the wise men, the men of reason, the forerunners. of modern Freemasonry, its acknowledged, praised, blessed, and imitated ancestors by their sons in their doctrines, their morals and their hypocrisy!

((t) Michelet, Histoire de France, 1.1!, p. 104 et seq., 400, 47?. Compare in the work already cited by Mr. Douais, the chapter on Jewish Schools in the Middle Ages. We cannot overemphasize the persistence of these hotspots of spread of the anti-Christianity for centuries, during which society seems to us to be far away to have been completely Christian. Father Pachtler points out the rabbinical origin of certain Masonic legends, which odiously attack the divinity of Our Lord, (V. Mille Krieg gegen Thron und Altar, 2* ed. p. 309-320.)

We now ask this of all men of good faith: where did the barbarians take away, where did the executioners take away? and it was he, after having employed all the means of persuasion to bring these hordes of brigands back into line gands, always ready to disguise themselves when they weren't the stronger, let them loot, kill, burn, corrupt the majority the rule of Christian and non-native populations, without allowing to the victims to defend themselves, without coming to their aid to protect them to manage their faith, their customs, their churches, their properties and their priests against the secular lords by whom and for whom it was exercised What execrable tyranny? Similarly, the writers of Freemasonry, in praising and striving forcing the Gnostics to justify themselves against religion and the Catholic Church The Manicheans and the Albigensians, who have shown themselves to be its sons, the heirs and the continuators, so it is with the Templars. There are few among the condemned of the Church who have had so much and such ardent apologists, few in whose favor one has so generously ralement et si recklessly accused the Pope and the bishops.

for the Freemasons and all the revolutionary philosophers or Jacobins. This is not, for anyone who wants to think about it, one of the least important evidence of their lineage and the conformity of their doctrines. But let's look for even more positive things in the authorities Masonic, and in these doctrines and practices themselves.

"The Knights Hospitaller of Saint John of Jerusalem, known under the name of Templars, or their Freemason successors, says Wil-Laume in his manual or Masonic Tiler, appear to be the authors of most of the degrees of initiation. We would think that they had been imagined by the Templars, in the times of their splendor, to isolate oneself from the crowd of initiates, if we did not notice not that these new degrees of initiation are almost all motivated by the state of order after its fall. We have no doubt, com We can see that the Templars were initiates, even from their very inception. tion; WE STILL THINK THAT EUROPE OWES FREEMASONRY TO THEM NERIE, and that these are the secret practices that served as a pretext for the accusation of irreligion and atheism that led them to such an end Tragic. Everything confirms this opinion.

"The misfortunes of these knights, the persecutions to which they succumbed combed, forcing them to seek a last refuge in those same mysteries to the establishment of which they had contributed so much; they found consolation and relief. Their situation not being common to other initiates, they considered tightening their bonds among themselves, without However, they separated themselves from the larger family of Freemasons; they formed these are the grades or degrees that we see added to the first three, and probably only communicated them to those initiated into the matter. which they thought they could rely on.

"The Templars disappeared into civil society, but they left behind successors in Freemasonry, and their institutions have survived. Such, it seems to us, is the history and the course of Freemasonry. stupidity (2).

Ragon also traces Freemasonry back to the Templars. He portrays them as having gathered in the East the doctrine of the ancient one of the Gnostics and the Manicheans. Then he adds this More precise argument:

Therefore, the leaders of the order had envisioned another, more worthy temple. no doubt from the Divinity: the whole world populated by free and green men killers. It was on the construction of this temple that they were working; and that that Jerusalem had once seen rise, during the reign of Solomon, in was the symbol, less because of its magnificence than because of its unity. Also, although the name Templars prevailed, they did not have lost between them that of masons. Nikolai, who refuses to admit it, provides, by the following fact, one of the strongest arguments. In Italy, there are ancient churches that belonged to the order before its abolition traditionally retains the name of churches, such as Delia Massone or Maccione. Doesn't this mean that the people, before calling them that, had they realized that Freemason and Templar were the same thing? (1)

"Masons of all ranks are armed with swords," he wrote in 1806, F.. Chereau, officer in the G.. O.*, of France. The military apparatus the most imposing one always accompanies and protects the ceremonies religious, scientific research and in general all the work of disciples and initiates. But it is only at the Rosicrucian rank that The warlike origin is evident to the eyes of the uninitiated.

"They only learn then: 1° that the designated Masonic order under the name of Blue Freemasonry, formerly the sanctuary of philosophy, knew how to honor the misfortunes of an august, religious and military order, vic- a time of ignorance, fanaticism, and shameful greed, but dignified by his virtues of attaining the highest destinies; 2° that he deserved by services reported to become an integral part of this illustrious order whose knights were all originally masons; 3° that the priests of the temple The people of Memphis now marched under the banners of the temple. the city of Jerusalem, after having sworn love, obedience and fidelity to his laws and to its ministers; 4° that the two orders, united by an indissoluble bond soluble, they became one and the same association... course of F.*, de Banville, former officer also of the Grand Orient of France, pronounced on April 8, 1839 in the lodge of the knights of the Cross, where he perfectly traced the origin of the association Masonic, says the editor:

"In my system, which I hope to demonstrate in a few words, the or Masonic order would be an offshoot of the Order of the Temple, of which you know the history and the misfortunes, and it cannot be reasonable – something else entirely. Freemasonry must have originated in Scotland; it was certainly, originally, a cautious and skillfully combined form born that knights of this country devised in order to steal the continuation of their illustrious order in the clear-sighted eyes of their all-powerful proscribers.

"The heroic William de Moure, Grand Prior of England and Scotland" from his prison he could direct the knights of his language in the creation, organization and development of the rite Masonic, intended to conceal, from the eyes of the uninitiated, the order of the Templars proscribed and anathema. It is understandable that this transformation local, in the language of Scotland, of the Order of the Temple in the masonic order, had to remain constantly shrouded in the deepest secrecy; It is understandable that the unfortunate Templars, unjustly slandered by vile renegades, cowardly betrayed by ignoble apostates who were like wild beasts in almost all Christian countries held, forced to hide their names and qualities under penalty of the most Given the dreadful persecutions and the most horrible torture, one can understand that these innocent victims of a king's avarice and a pope's jealousy were able to invent, to recognize each other and help each other in everything, everywhere for everything, in the countries of France, Germany and Sweden, where the Freemasonry soon penetrated, sacred words and superseded words, signs and the touches that have come down to us intact from generation to generation. Besides, how would we explain, on the part of a vast association of philanthropists united for the honorable purpose of re- to lavish with both hands the consolations and the alms of Christian charity, these strict prohibitions against saying anything, to write, draw, or engrave nothing on the laudable goal of this society secret, without incurring the certain consequences of atrocious revenge, without to finally expose oneself to having one's throat cut, heart and entrails torn out, the body burned and reduced to ashes, the ashes scattered to the winds, and left Furthermore, a memory held in contempt by all Freemasons? All of this would take the character of a revolting absurdity, if one were to remove the explanation, simple and satisfactory for the reason, of the powerful interest that the Knights Templar hiding from all eyes, under the cloak of the Masonry, specially organized for this purpose by themselves.

century by members of the Order of the Temple, of the obedience of the great-priory of Scotland, and that this beautiful institution radiated from this point and spread easily throughout European lands, which were then covered with our outlawed predecessors. It would be easy for me to accumulate names abundant evidence, drawn from the comparison of rituals in use in the two orders, and one would be surprised at first to notice a system there identical reception, proceeding by way of physical and moral tests and trials. One would be no less struck by this singular analogy in the two orders of the same mode of initiation, of a certain series of grades, among which one sometimes finds such a resemblance to the Templar chivalry which she can rightly pass for a perfect similarity (1).

Now, turning against F.*, de Banville, against the Ma- stupidity and the Templars, these arguments so strong and so tightly focused on the secrets of Freemasonry and the Temple from which it emerged, I will ask him in turn: Why these secrets, these oaths, whose violation is punished with such atrocious tortures, if happiness their goal is the consolation and the Are alms from Christian charity their only means? For What, especially now that Freemasonry is protected everywhere? triumphant everywhere, she continues her secret lodges, her initiations and terrible oaths? Here is a summary of this authentic act and the series of accusations on which the interrogation revolved, a series drawn up by the Pope's order, based on the confessions of 72 of the most notable Templars, done before the popes and cardinals, or before the bishops or the particular councils, freely, without torture and under the sole faith in the oath to tell the truth and the whole truth:

We can therefore conclude not approximately, but certainly formation with the great historian Friedrich Schlegel:

"As for the origin or source from which the esoteric influence—The Freemasonry movement spread throughout Europe, for whatever reason or Whatever interest one may have in denying or acknowledging it, it results in roughly obviously from the sole examination of the facts, that the Order of the Templars was the bridge over which this whole set of mysteries has passed in the West, of the less quanta the form, which continues today to be the same as a—then. It is only through the traditions of Solomon and on his temple, to the to which the very institution of order is linked, which can be explained the symbols of Freemasonry.

"The very idea of such a society, of such a pure doctrine..." esoteric knowledge and its secret propagation are hardly compatible with Christianity; for Christianity is already in itself a mystery divine, but a mystery which, according to the views of its founder, is exposed visible to all and celebrated daily on every altar. THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN SECT SINCE THE 14th CENTURY UNTIL 18th CENTURY

I. – The Persistence of Gnosis

The comparisons made in the previous chapter indicate quite a bit how Freemasonry derives doctrinally from the heresies of the Middle Ages and collected their unholy traditions in a vast Syncretism, illogical perhaps, but faithfully reproducing their hatred of the mystery of Jesus Christ. The generic name of gnosis to him still applies today, as in the times when this false science, daughter of the enemy man, fought against the establishment of the Church. It is much more difficult to establish through documents. followed the material transmission of this radical heresy, since the abolition of the Templars, who had given him in the middle of the Christian Ages, a powerful organization.

Was the Order of the Temple completely destroyed in 1312?

We have seen how a constant tradition in the lodges affirms master its perpetuation. According to some writers, he would never have ceased to exist in France as a clandestine association. Jacques Molay would have established a grand master, Larmény, whose powers would have been successively passed on to a series of characters, Among them are Duguesclin and several princes of Bourbon [The modern Order of the Temple, which we will have to to speak and which in the middle of the 18th century had as its grand master the Count of Clermont would thus be linked by a transformation Regular to the old order. In support of this opinion, it is shown There is currently still a charter of transmission dated 1326. Conventionalist Gregory published it and became a fervent follower of the order (1). The Freemasons of Germany and Italy were overjoyed with favors from the sovereign pontiffs, and nothing in the statutes of Strasbourg of 1462, nor even in the revised statutes of 1563, bears no trace of heresy or hostility towards the Church. However, in 1535 we find a document which shows us, under the name of Freemasons, an order whose anti-Christian principles are ab- solely those of modern Freemasonry. This document has been found in 1816 along with others relating to the founding of a lodge in Amsterdam, 1519, in Botzelaar's papers. Doubts Serious questions are being raised about its authenticity. However, like no other, absolutely decisive argument has not removed any product against her and that of new discoveries could confirm it, we believe we should provide the translation:

and its propagation methods are identically the same.

A particular memory is attached to the apostate Ochin, former general of the Capuchins, whom we see in 1646 at the head of a real convent.

"He attended," says Feller in the universal biography, "the famous conference of deists or atheists, in Vicenza, in 1546, where they agreed on 'means of' destroying the religion of Jesus Christ, by forming a society, a company which, through progressive successes, led, at the end of the 18th century, an almost general apostasy. When the Republic of Venice, informed from this conspiracy, had Jules Trévisan and François de seized Hugo, who were suffocated, Ochin escaped with the others. The society thus dispersed, it only became more dangerous; that is the one we known today. Ochin was one of those who distinguished themselves the most in the execution of the halted project. He poured torrents of oil on all

He died there the same year of the plague, at the age of 77. He was also hated by Protestants and Catholics.

Similar meetings appear to have taken place in Modena and in Treviso. (1) that in that same year, 1546, Pope Paul III addressed letters to the Republic of Venice to alert them to this dangerous situation of corruption (1). The Venetian senate ordered measures immediate. Jules Trévisan and François de Lugo were arrested, who were executed. The others, including Ochino and Leilius Socin, Peruta, Gentilis, Jacques Chiari, Darius Socin, Alcias, the abbot Leonardo, dispersed (2). But when one knows the career of these figures, we see that they were the propagators in Europe they are far less concerned with Protestantism than with this radical negation of Christianity, which was already the essence of Freemasonry. Some external demonstrations took place outside at the turmoil of the religious wars, as for example the sect of the libertines, who preached that Jesus Christ was Satan, that the Gospel was a fable, that it was nonsense to die for religion, that there is only one in the universe spirit which is God, that all evil and good are indistinguishable God's role as the sole agent (3). Such preaching, very different from the point of view specific to Protestantism, indicates they appreciate the persistence of the old practices in hidden homes. Manichean and Gnostic doctrines.

Kabbalah, of Jewish origin, was also at that time like another branch, or derivative or tributary, of the sect, and very-active for evil. Read, for example, this sketch of the life of a 16th-century Kabbalists, such as Agrippa von Nettesheim, that it is found in the YAllycmeincs Encyclopedia of Wissens - Chaften und Kunste by Ersch and Grttber:

After Having read it, one better understands Condorcet's words about centuries that stretch from the suppression of the Templars to the times modern;

"This spirit of freedom and inquiry can be found in all eras." until the moment when, aided by the invention of printing, it was powerful enough to liberate part of Europe from the yoke of the court of Rome. Even then, there existed a class of men who, superior to all superstitions, were content to despise them in secret or at most they allowed themselves to sprinkle a few drops on them as they passed by traits of a ridiculousness, made more striking by a veil of respect with which they had taken care to cover it. We will examine whether, in a time

III. – PLACES OF MASONIC ACTION IN THE 17TH CENTURY.

A writer of questionable repute, Findel, does not hesitate to suggest that the Nova Ailantis of Chancellor Bacon (born in 1560, died in 1626) undoubtedly contains Masonic data:

"Bacon," he said, "imagines in this book an island of Bensalcm and a society secret. The island of Bensalem will, it is true, be presented and described as a land of asylum in the world, but the House of Solomon and the college. The position of the college on the six days of creation must remain hidden to the rest of the world and to be revealed only to initiates. The members of the college find a cedar wood chest in the sea, from which emerges a green palm frond and in which the books are found biblical. The ancient one, king and lawgiver at the same time, does not want that the secrets of this island are revealed to foreigners. The members of the college is called Brothers (1).

If we find in the Nova Atlanlis the data which later would lay the foundations of English Freemasonry, all the more so should we see this as a manifestation of the sect that was asserting itself at the Cologne convention, and whose organization obviously serves as a type similar to that outlined in this book. For the general public, this was noted that it was a bold fantasy, but for those in the know it had a practical meaning.

A German writer Amos is also linked to this origin. Comenius, born in 1592, was strongly hostile to the Church. He came from Fulneck, principal establishment of the brothers in Bohemia, where he was preaching. As a teacher and professor, he first went to Lissa; in 1641, he is found he spent time in England; then in Amsterdam, where he died in 1671.

"His opera dulacticia," Findel continued, "contain several passages whose analogy with the Masonic Constitutions, published in 1723 by Anderson, is striking.... After having worked in vain at the union of all religions, he rose to a human point of view general.

"but to all those who are born men, she could be named
"Even more accurately, Pansophy, or human wisdom."

The influence of his writings on the grand lodge established in 1717 cannot be ignored, says Findel; these are also, he adds will we, the fundamental ideas of Saint-Martin and of Weisliaupt, as the doctrine indicated in a very clear way related to the Cologne charter of 1535.

Around the same time (1623–1677), a man appeared whose activity as a writer and his philosophical fortune are also remarkable Quables, Barucli or Bencdict Spinoza, this son of a Portuguese Jew, who converted to Protestantism, but infiltrated throughout the 17th century® century a pantheism drawn from certain rabbinical schools. His Its influence was completely out of proportion to its origin, its situation tion and its literary value. We note that its philosophical doctrines Sophistic and political are both those that the lodges have propagated in the following century and those indicated in the charter of Cologne. Was Spinoza a member of this secret society? We have not been able to find direct proof of this so far; but the support he encountered in all circumstances of his life, the protection that Elector Palatine Charles Louis assured him in him entrusting him with a chair of philosophy in Heidelberg, despite his atheism me notorious, the zeal with which his friends circulated his Trac- ta tus theolof/ ico-p ol il te us, despite the prohibition of the Estates-General Dutch politicians, and spread it under false titles in England land, in France, in Germany, in Switzerland, all of this is a fact. quite extraordinary and thought-provoking, as Pachtler says that other forces were at play and working with him (1).

(1) Pachtler, Stiile Krieg der Freimaurcrei, p. 187 to 189.

We must also take into account another sect which probably had come from the same source, and which, on the particular ground wherever she positioned herself, she always allied herself with the deists or the pantheists and joined forces with them to fight the Church and the ghouls civil government. We want to talk about the Ilose-Croix brothers, who combined the practices of alchemy with the superstitions of the Kabbalah rabbinic and promised their followers a mysterious life of pledge of the senses. At the beginning of the 17th century, they appeared both in Italy and Germany and are deploying extraordinary activity dinner. The first document that serves as their rallying cry is published, in 1612, in Venice, under the title of La lié formation générale; then the publications of the Fama fraternitatis, of the Thémis Aurea de Maier, multiplied in the following years in Germany, in Holland and England. These so-called scholars form a secret brotherhood extending throughout Europe and constituting par- all of small groups communicating with each other (1).

These societies, Eckert adds, imitating the ancient mysteries, proposed to bring all the sciences into their order, and to mo to nopolish within their ranks; and indeed they won over all the scholars, few many at that time, and preserved the results of their work scientists like secrets of the order. They were divided into seven grades, according to the seven days of creation; and at the same time, for to mean more precisely that the main goal they had in mind was that of mysteries, the investigation of the being and activity of the nature, ritual, symbols and names were borrowed from the temp folds, either in order to encourage them to accept the fundamental principle of equality between nobility and science, and to maintain as possible the order thus transformed, either because one was looking at the Templars like the temporary custodians of the mysteries that one could well modify, but not abolish. Facing these, and under the leadership of Following the famous Bacon, another society of scholars was formed in the order, which resolved to publish his scientific productions, and to attack publicly "This forms the basis of the Catholic Church (2)."

According to Moréri, the Rosicrucian order claimed dating back to the 14th century. They could not prove it by demonstrated, from the beginning of the 17th century, a great activity. "From 1604 onwards," he said, "these new brothers begin to distribute small books throughout Germany; The Illuminati of Spain emerged from it, and both groups have been condemned as fanatics." As early as 1619, an anonymous pamphlet The nym, Roseæ crucis frater, denounced all that was dangerous to this association, and the famous Campaella, in his book De Monarchia hispanica discursus, published in Amsterdam in 1640, reports the Rosicrucian Brotherhood as systematically pursuing systematically the upheaval in society (p. 537 et seq.).

The Rosicrucian sect, says Findel, was continued by Valentin Andréa, born in 1586, died in 1654 (1).

In England, it was propagated by Dr. Robert Fludd, better known as Aflactibus, a doctor in London, who, from 1616, he published an English edition of the Fama fraternitatis, and later, by the antiquarian Elias Askmo, whom we see, on the other hand, to be received into Freemasonry in 1646 and who drafted the rituals later adopted by the Grand Lodge of London in 1717 (2). From then on, and even admitting that until that time the Masonic lodges were mostly simple institutions. In these social structures, an anti-Christian spirit developed rapidly. "Demented," as Nikolai will tell us.

The Netherlands was the main center of this sect. According to the contemporary testimony from L. Orvius, it existed in 1622 in The Hague, a Rosicrucian lodge, belonging to the first classes of society. They claimed to have corresponding groups based in Amsterdam, Nuremberg, Danzig, Erfurt, Mantua and Venice (2).

In England and Scotland, Freemasonry proper had developed more and more thanks to Protestantism, and it had deviated from its character as a professional association from the end of the 16th century, perhaps even from the middle of this century, by receiving in its lodges people who were not part of the art of building. Thus, one sees in the archives of the lodge of the Mary's Chapel in Edinburgh, where a John Bosswell esquire was received

This dual origin, this paternity of English antiquarians, still imbued at that time with the ideas of alchemists and astrologers, and This annexation to a trade guild explains quite well the a curious mix of emblems that seem borrowed from antiquity more remote, and professional tools that are found in the symbolism and in the outward signs of Freemasonry.

Having come to power, Cromwell initially relied on his old friends the levelers, whose first symbols had been the set square and the compass; for a moment, one could believe that he had dreamed of freedom, equality and natural law, because, for its propaganda, to which it allocated considerable funds, he divided the land into four major divisions. Freemasonry had served this revolution tion and powerfully contributed to its success; she emerged from it entirely-powerful and restored (1).

Such, at least, is the very old tradition in the lodges. English, including Freemason writers, such as Kloss, Mosdorff, Lindner, and Nikolai echoed this sentiment. Spanish Freemasonry and the Existence of God Freemasonry is no more harmless in Spain than anywhere else. There too she is actively working to uproot Christianity from the soul of the nation, especially in the upper classes. The document following, which we borrow from the Masonic World of August 1880, shows that she follows, with regard to the recognition of God, the movement given in France, Belgium, and Italy. It has only adopted the hypocritical formulas used in the latter country, but clearly specifying the atheist scope of its statutes. This What adds to the gravity of this document is that it emanates from the part of Spanish Freemasonry which is relatively moderate and who brought the young Alfonso XII to the throne (1).

"The Grand Orient of Spain, presided over by Brother Sagasta, met on May 13, to begin drafting a new constitution. In its first session, the Grand Orient made the following declarations Claims: 1. Freemasons defend the unity of the nation; 2. Freemasonry does not intervene in political struggles; 3° can enter into our order all those who are not enemies of liberty...

Another symptom reveals the seriousness of the masonry work that in Spain, there has been a proliferation of androgynous lodges since 1877. La Chaîne d'Union, year 1880, p. 203 and p. 233, informs us that several lodges of this kind were formed at that time and that they received from ladies belonging to the highest society. On page 208, one can read the account of the reception at the Fraternilad lodge Iberica, no. 690, June 14, 1880, "of an illustrious lady belonging by "his birth and his properties to the Austro-Hungarian nobility and by

It is impossible not to recall the systematic plan of corruption of women that the Italian Haute-Vente was beginning to foster in 1819. The situation in Spain, under Alfonso XII, is reminiscent of the situation in Europe at the same time, and the methods of the sects are the same.

THE ORIGINS OF CIVIL MARRIAGE AND FREEDOM UNION

Civil marriage is one of the institutions that Freemasonry propagates with the greatest zeal, and this very year F.-Salhanda Marino, grand master of the Orient in Brazil, expressed himself thus 4 this subject :

"To request the institution of civil marriage, in order to remove our fellow citizens subjected to the tyranny exercised in the name of an exclusive church and intolerable; to obtain, through the secularization of cemeteries, respect mortal remains against the insults of a religious sect that*

The divorce, which is also their corollary of marriage in Masonic doctrine (page 207), allows us to arrive at the same result.

But while weddings are being ostentatiously celebrated in Paris Masonic (2), logical minds demand the suppression of the Masonic or civil marriage, even with unlimited divorce, is an oppressive formalism, which advanced men reject. just as they want to free Freemasonry from the symbolism that The wise ones still deem it prudent to keep for a certain time (Introduction, IV). This is the only difference that separates these two layers of secret societies; but the principles are identical ticks and the source from which they drew their sustenance is common. This letter Even this is proof of it, because it is based on a page of life by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, which was very opportunely handed over to day by Mr. André Gairai, in a very interesting study on te Civil Marriage and Religious Marriage (Grenoble, in-8°, 1880, Raralier, editor). "Thérèse Levasseur, a simple innkeeper's daughter, seemed to have nothing, which could inspire passion in a philosopher of Rousseau's stature. Different, but generally unflattering, portraits have been drawn of she who was both his servant and his concubine.

"Before resuming the account of the memoirs that retrace the scene of the marriage, let us listen to J.-J. Rousseau, personally, in the explanations statements that he felt it appropriate to give regarding this event, by different rents letters written shortly afterwards.

recently taken up in England by this major question of the population, to the one of all French writers who has the most profound. We have studied the doctrines of our most modern economists. We do not let us not exaggerate, in asserting that the most advanced of our thinkers are now fully aware of the existence of the remedy that the Neo-Malthusians contribute to the ills of society. We will explain how things got to this point,

"Shortly after the publication of Malthus's work, some Thinkers noted that, in modern France, caution after Marriage, to a certain extent, replaced late marriages. customary in most European states. Mr. Francis Place was a among the first who, in a book on population, recommended the adoption tion in England of physical impediments so frequently encountered raised by French parents. Apparently, he had a discussion with Malthus on the subject of the expression "vice" as applied by the latter, in the first edition of his Essay, on the use of such impediments; Tradition holds that, in the subsequent edition, Malthus renounced his to use this word. Moreover, since Malthus only had two children, Mr. Porter (of Nottingham) supposes that, like John Stuart's father Mill himself was one of the faithful adherents of the practiced marital prudence. by the wealthiest peasants and townspeople. It is also said that Mr. Place converted the socialist Robert Owen to his views, and Mr. Owen had to the success of his New Lanark colony to his knowledge in this material, which he communicated to his workers. Mr. Robert Dale Owen, son Robert Owen emigrated to the United States of America in his youth. became one of the most distinguished citizens of the Western Republic, and died in 1377. He had, without a doubt, heard this being discussed questioned by his father, by Mr. Place, and by others. In 1830, he felt compelled to publish a treatise, well-known today, on the question of population: under the title "Moral Physiology", this work contains the most philanthropic ideas, written in a language clear, very neat, and perfectly fulfilling the author's purpose; there This work describes the physical impediments mentioned above. had, however, been preceded by Richard Garlile's treatise, entitled: "The "Every Woman's Book," a treatise that calls things by their name; the author was one of those bold minds who did everything possible to complete the reform in England and ensure that this country freedom of the press and of speech. Without him and his collaborators in terms of development, England might be as backward as Spain. Last. Then Dr. Charles Knowlton, a highly distinguished physician from Boston, Massachusetts, in the United States, wrote a small pamphlet on this subject, uuï'so famous, "The fruits of philosophy" (Fruits of philosopha), which contains, in a popular form, good physiological notions questions and a very complete exposition of the impediments recommended by Messrs. Dale Owen and Carlile. This work was followed, at a fairly long interval, from a small booklet by Mr. Austin Holyoake, entitled Large and small families, which was sold for many years, alongside the treatises of Carlile, Owen's and other works, by the booksellers of the ultra-liberal party English; this party has, in the last instance, taken the name of secularist party.

"In 1876, the pamphlet was published as The Fruits of Philosophy," after having circulated freely for forty years, was suddenly prosecuted as an obscene publication, by virtue of an Act of Parliament called "Lord Campbell's Act"; a bookseller from Bristol, named Cook, was sentenced to two years in prison for selling this book. The publisher of In London, MC Watts was also prosecuted, but submitted and in was left to pay the costs, namely a fine of approximately five thousand francs. Knowlton's book was about to be suppressed when MC Bradlaugh, leader of the secularist party and editor-in-chief of the most progressive of English newspapers, from the "National Reformer", and a very young woman-distinguished, Mrs. Besant, bravely stepped forward to sell to publish this. To bring the case before the courts, Mr. Bradlaugh and Ms. Besant joined forces, renting in "Stonecutter Street," in London, an advertising establishment, sold publicly They reviewed "The Fruits of Philosophy" and sent copies of it. to the City authorities. Mr. Bradlaugh had been for many years an avowed Malthusian; Mrs. Besant was also convinced of the importance tact of the question. Both were determined not to suffer that a society bigot was able, without encountering any resistance, to ban this work the law. The trial took place in the first instance in the court of Guildhall, then from there to the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, where the debates, which began on June 18, 1877, lasted three days. Among the jurors were, among other people enjoying a position of exceptional wealth and fortune, Mr. Arthur Walter, Esq., son of owner of the "Times". After a brilliant defense, where the speeches Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh made a powerful impression on the president and of all persons present, the jury rendered the verdict The following is a very enigmatic statement: "We unanimously believe that the The book in question (The Fruits of Philosophy) aims to corrupt public morality; but at the same time, we completely exonerate the defendants of any corrupt motive in the publication of this book. The judge, whose summary was entirely in favor of the accused, would not have imposed only a formal fine; but upon learning that they had Intending to continue the sale, he sentenced them to a severe punishment of prison, along with a fine. Fortunately, the Supreme Court of Appeal-

The lower court decided that there had been an error in the indictment. The defense They were released. The prosecution has not been renewed since.

"The emotion caused by this trial resulted in the founding of a society called the "Malthusian League," created with the aim of opposing a active and passive resistance to any attempt to stifle the discussion of the population issue. Mr. Bradlaugh had already tried, There are a few armies, to form a league of this kind; but the opinion The idea was not yet sufficiently developed. The League's first meeting took place at the Minor Hall of the Hall of Science, Old Street, on 17 July 1877. The agenda included the election of officers. In this At the meeting, Dr. G. R. Drysdale was appointed chairman; Ms. Annie Besant, Messrs. Ilmeyer and R. Shearer were appointed honorary secretaries; the League council was composed of Messrs. Bell, Brown, Dray, Page, Mr. and Mrs. Parris, Mr. and Mrs. Rensick, Mr. Rivers, Seyler, G. Standring, Truelove and Young; Mr. Swagman was appointed treasurer of the League.

"Very shortly after the League was formed, Mr. Edward Truelove, bookseller in Holborn, was prosecuted in the Queen's Bench, February 1, 1878. The works in question, of the same nature as The Fruits of Philosophy were entitled: "Physiology of Man," a very philanthropic pamphlet by Mr. Robert Dale Owen, Senator of the United States; and the Poverty of the Individual, the Family and the Nation." Mr. Truelove was admirably defended by Mr. William Ilmeyer. The trial was inconclusive, one of the jurors having declared that he viewed the book in question as inspired by very-moral and very philanthropic. Mr. Ilmeyer, Secretary of the Society for the suppression of the vice, resumed the prosecution. Mr. Truelove passed the 9 May 1878 before the "Central Criminal Court" and was sentenced to four Three months in prison and a fine of two thousand five hundred francs. The case was judged and brought before the Court of Appeal. On April 9, 1870, the Court of Appeal upheld the judgment of the first First court. Ms. Besant thus had her little girl taken from her. The alleged the husband's (who is a pastor in the established Church of England) statement was based on what Mr. Besant did not believe in English theology and had published a work considered immoral by a jury (1).

"It is certain," said Robison, "that before 1743 there existed an association whose sole purpose is to destroy them to their very foundations religious institutions, and to overthrow all existing governments both in Europe, and the system of this association had become universal, and that the Freemasons' lodges served as his school (1).

They had for successors the Duke of Antin in 1738, and in 1743, the Count of Clermont, prince of the blood, whose rivals were the prince de Conti and Marshal de Saxe.

Alongside the Freemasonry of the ancient rite, emanating from the great London lodge, we see the emergence at this time of a new the Order of the Temple, closely related to Freemasonry and... destined to unite with her. Clavel recounts that the regent Philippe d'Or Léans was the author of this reconstruction and he took steps with the Order of Christ of Portugal to obtain the old constitutions of the Temple. In any case, the order had as its great successively master the Duke of Maine, the Count of Clermont, the Prince of Conti, then the Duke of Cossé-Brissac who, at the time of

A writer belonging to Freemasonry, d'Asveld, is

We shall see (Book II, Chapter VIII, § 5) the same writer reveal the role played by the Order of the Temple during the Restoration; But let's not get ahead of ourselves and let's point out here some strange propagators of Freemasonry.

Frederick of Prussia actively engaged, during his reign, in the organization of Freemasonry. To establish more connections the Masonic Order of St. John, which only had four ranks, with the Templar systems, which were then reappearing, he or Scottish Freemasonry was organized with twenty-five degrees, super posing at the Freemasonry of St. John. The rite he created was called the rite of the princes of the royal secret, named after its highest grade: with various alterations dating from the late 18th century, it is the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, which governs the supreme law today I advise in France and this is practiced in most of the Grand Orients (2).

Among the most zealous propagators of Freemasonry, At that time was the Knight of Ramsay, the author of the rite Scottish. He was unable to get it accepted by the Grand Lodge of London dres, who had henceforth broken with the Stuarts (book I, chapter II, § 3); but he quickly spread it in France under the name of strict observance, thanks to the numerous ranks it offered to the frivolity of the followers. He presented it as a continuation of the Order of the Temple, or whether he had actually found some whatever traditions in his homeland, or whether it was a pure subterfuge for his political aims.

Ramsay was, in fact, acting in the interest of the legitimate heir of the Stuarts and he hoped to use this organization to do so to return to the throne of England. This is not the only time that Honest parties have tried to use occult associations. to achieve a legitimate purpose. This weapon has always been used turned against them, and the genius of evil, hidden in – the Freemason–

Lucet, his carpet Sier, and Cellier, his watchmaker, with "the power not only of to make knights, but even to create a chapter in all the cities where they would believe they should do it (1). »

This is how Masonic rites of all kinds spread were geeking out, with a strange confusion of goals, people, and means. Such patronage explains how so many men honorable men were involved; but the influence of the Stuarts in the lodges they had founded was ephemeral, and we will say later how, on the eve of the Revolution, the leaders of the movement They went about eliminating the honest elements who were there found. The name of Robespierre, father of the famous convention * nel, clearly indicates what dangerous elements were also creeping in. therefore (2).

"It was also the English who established the first lodges" from Germany, according to Clavel, in Cologne in 1716, according to Robison, in Hamburg, in 1734. In 1740, the Grand Lodge of England founded She herself is the Absalon lodge, which unites all the others.

"As early as 1757," continues the authoritative historian of Freemasonry, The Grand Lodge of England had appointed Prince Henry William,

The auspices were based in Altenburg and Nuremberg. The following year boasts, German Freemasonry made an acquisition of the highest Importance: Still a royal prince, Frederick the Great was received at Brunswick, on the night of August 14–15, 1758, without the knowledge of his father, the king reigning, who had always opposed the establishment of society in his states, and had declared that he would deal with the utmost rigor any attempt that might be made for this purpose; therefore, the utmost secrecy was kept absolute on the initiation of the young prince. Once he became king, the propaganda machine The Templar conic encountered no further obstacles. Such was the organization "Primitive Freemasonry in Germany."

If Freemasonry, in its form as a philanthropic society that and in the ordinary rite, was imported into Germany from the Antient England at that time, we must not lose sight of the many secret orders that had existed there long before; most of them seem to come from Northern Germany, Sweden and the ancient possessions of the Teutonic Knights. Not only the mystery enveloped them for a long time, but so many deceptions and Apocryphal documents appeared at the time they began to try to lift the mask, which is almost impossible to illuminate. To recount this story completely (1). It suffices, for the demonstration that we are pursuing, to note the existence of all these associations and beliefs, also stemming from a hostile attitude towards Christianity and destined soon to merge under the auspices of the Enlightenment.

Freemasonry spread at the same time in the countries of southern Europe by the English.

"It is from 1726," said Glavel, "that the introduction of Freemasonry dates." In Spain. In that year, constitutions were granted by the Grand Lodge of England to a lodge that had formed in Gibraltar; in 1727 another lodge was founded in Madrid. Until 1779, this one... was aware of the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of England, from which she held her powers; but at that time she shook off the yoke and constituted her own workshops in Cadiz, Barcelona, Valladolid and in other cities.

"The front row seats," the young historian immediately adds, "who

Adoption Freemasonry

The speed with which Freemasonry spread in France, from Paris to the smallest provincial towns, the enthusiasm that led members of the high nobility to take part at meetings where they met not only with scholars and authors, but even with men of the most The lower classes, is one of the most curious features of history.

The frivolity of the time was such that, soon, in 1730, lodges women were created and destroyed, in the homes of many large families, Christian virtues and traditions domestic activities.

It was a French invention and not one of the least useful for the spread of Freemasonry.

The most prominent ladies were received there, swept away by the taste for pleasure, so keen at that time in the upper classes, and it is with sadness that we notice a little later, among the great mistresses of adoption, the Duchess of Bourbon, the Duchess of Chartres and the unfortunate Princess of Lamballe.

"It was around 1730," said Clavel, "that the Franc-ma- was instituted Women's stupidity. We don't know who invented it, but it made its first appearance in France... The forms of this Freemasonry However, these were not definitively fixed until after 1760, and it was not recognized and sanctioned by the administrative body (or Grand Orient) of Freemasonry only in 1774.

"Adoption Freemasonry initially adopted various names and various rituals, which have not survived to this day. In 1743, she had nautical emblems and vocabulary; and the sisters made the journey fictional island of bliss, under the sail of the brothers, and piloted by them. This was then the order of the facilitators, which included the ranks of cabin boy, his boss, squadron commander and vice-admiral, all had as their admiral, that is- that is to say, for grand master, the f. \ of Chambonnet, who was the author.

"She took the oath, seated in the place of the squadron commander or president"

"A split of this kind, resulting from inappropriate receptions," he said Bazot, in 1745, the Freemason historian continues, gave birth to the order knights and knightesses of the anchor, which was merely a purge of the first one, and which had retained its formulas.

"Two years later, in 1747, the Chevalier Beauchaine, the most best and the most zealous of the venerable, immovable figures of Paris, the same one who had established its logo in a cabaret on rue Saint-Victor, under the sign of the Golden Sun, which slept there and gave for six francs, in a single session, all degrees of Freemasonry, instituted the order of the fen- of the charioteers, whose ceremonies were modeled on those of the charioteer coterie Bonniers, one of the many branches of the Compagnons du Devoir.

"These meetings were extraordinarily popular. They took place in a large garden located in the New France district, outside from Paris. Courtiers, men and women, flocked there in droves, Arm in arm, dressed in blouses or coarse woolen petticoats, the their feet shod in heavy clogs, and there they indulged in all manner of revelry and all the unpretentiousness of popular gaiety.

"Other amirogyne (both sexes) societies succeeded that one: Such were the orders of the Axe, the Hundred, and Fidelity, whose forms became closer to those of Freemasonry or dinner... All the notables of Paris, in literary circles, in the arts and among the nobility, flocked to the lodge in 1760 adoption agency founded by the Count of Beurnonville in New France and to those that several other lords held at the same time in their hotels. The Lodge of the Nine Sisters, under the presidency of Ms. Helvétius, that of the Social Contract, presided over by the Princess of Lam- ball, thus celebrated brilliant festivities, in which the joys of the The feast and the ball did not make them forget the misfortune.

Ragon, who recounts, in his Complete Manual of Freemasonry adoption, the actions and deeds of an order of this kind founded in 1774 in the small house of the Duke of Orléans, which he calls gra • two and a place of delights, he immediately adds to his story:

"Androgynous societies, especially that of the felicitaries and that of the back knights and rose nymphs, despite their frivolous appearance, were a very powerful agent in spreading Adoption Freemasonry and sow in people's minds the seeds of Masonic principles of equality.

"Among the great mistresses who have distinguished themselves in the art of adoption" We will mention, said Ragon, the illustrious sisters: Duchess of Bourbon (the protector of Saint-Martin, the founder of Martinism, the sister of Philippe-Égalité). She was installed, in 1775, as Grand Mistress of all the lodges of France, at the lodge of St-Antoine, climate of Paris.

"Sisters bearing the biggest names in France," adds the intermediary. The authorized loan officers assisted these high-ranking officials. In this large gathering The list includes the names of the sisters of Genlis and Duchesnois (the co-dienne). »

"Madame de Genlis," adds Ragon, "was even nicknamed more "Late the mother of the church." We ourselves have heard attestations by an attaché of the Palais-Royal, which was being played there at that time, comedy in the state of pure nature, as before the original sin Genet, a state to which Freemasonry, for whom original sin is Property, royalty, and family have as their supreme purpose... to bring back.

"Why," adds Mr. de St-Albin, "the worthy lover of the worthy Sister Mother of Véglise, was he not also hailed with the title of father from that church? Why separate this brother and sister who did they make the journey to the City of Bliss together (1)?

IV. – Lodges and parliaments.

In vain were the meetings in the lodges defended in 1737 by Cardinal de Fleury, and Freemasonry condemned, the year next, by Pope Clement XII; the training was all the more strong.

A distinguished scholar, Mr. Ch. Gérin, collected information from the papers from the Attorney General of the Parliament of Paris, Joly de Fleury, some very curious features on the spread of Franc-ma- Stupidity in France, from 1737 to 1764:

Certainly, even more so than today, the greater part men and women who joined obeyed the influence of fashion, and did not realize the despicable and antisocial breast that was hidden in the lodges.

11, however, did not escape the notice of all clear-sighted men and to the authorities, into whose hands information arrived were there in large numbers.

Several of the magistrates with whom Joly de Fleury and Daguesseau corresponds, regarding Freemasonry, to point out the profound irreligion, the spirit of revolt against royal authority which it is propagated there, and as early as 1729 the Chevalier de Folard, yielding to the voice of remorse, of zealous disciple of Freemasonry became its courageous whistleblower; he denounced it as a sect of others all the more worthy of attracting the attention of sovereigns than, in the omni-shrouded in mystery, she was nurturing a revolution that was destined to strike. At once all legitimate powers were targeted. They did not initially He paid no heed to his revelations, so obvious did the conspiracy seem. likely (1). However, the symptoms multiplied, and Cardinal de Fleury, the wise minister of Louis XV, banned formally Freemasonry. The following year, by the bull In eminenti, on April 28, 1738, Pope Clement XII launched a the end of the excommunication against Freemasons, after having having taken the long and conscientious information that precedes the acts of this kind. Successively all governments of Europe, even Protestants, defended their meetings (2), at Similar edicts were issued in 1737. of the Elector Palatine of Bavaria and of the Grand Duke of Tuscany; in 1738, of the Magistrate of Hamburg. The same year, Frederick I, King of Sweden, banned all Masonic meetings were held under penalty of death, and Emperor Charles VI forbade them in the Austrian Netherlands. In the following years, the kings of Naples, of Portugal, from Poland, from Spain, the government of the canton of Berne, the Ottoman Porte, pioneered measures against lodges. In 1763, the magistrate of Danzig prohibited the Masonic lodges by an edict in which we read the following passage: "Given that we we learned that these so-called Freemasons, having recommended certain verses they seek to undermine the foundations of Christianity, to introduce the spirit of indifference against that doctrine, of course, to replace it with natural religion;

Apart from the more thoughtful men who could a systematic design followed in the lodges, their multiplication in France and throughout Europe, among the educated classes, made possible the campaign waged so vigorously against the Church and the Christian monarchy, by the impious scholars of time.

Their widespread presence explains the prodigious success what did even the most mediocre works of these sects of scholars have to offer? who called themselves economists and philosophers, and who were undermining all institutions with weapons the most diverse. admirable role as moderator of power and propagator of popular freedoms that had been fulfilled for so many centuries by the doctrine the trine of the Church. It was Diderot who wrote in the System of the Nature :

<t It is due to a lack of knowledge of one's own nature, one's own tendency, one's needs and his rights, that man, in society, has fallen from freedom his heart and to sacrifice his well-being to the whims of his superiors.

Any government, to be legitimate, can only be founded on the free consent from society, without which it is nothing but violence, an usurpation, a banditry. Those in charge of governing ment, depending on the form that society has chosen to give it, are called sovereigns, chiefs, legislators, monarchs, magistrates, representatives.
The government derives its power solely from society and is not established that for her own good, it is evident that she can revoke this power when its interest requires it, to change the form of government, to extend or limit the power she entrusts to her leaders, over whom she always retains a supreme authority, by the immutable law of nature which dictates that the tie is subordinate to the whole. As a result of the imprudence of nations, or of Masonic propaganda was beginning to attack the people campaigns, and contemporary testimonies show us the role played by this sect of economists, in which Mr. de Tocqueville recognized the ancestors of the Revolution.

THE DESTRUCTION OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION
HERE, THE FIRST OBJECT OF THE CONSPIRACY
MASONIC, AND THE ABOLITION OF COMMUNITY
JESUS' PAGE

I. – General plan finalized in the boxes for the abolition of the Jesuits.

Even after half a century of impious propaganda, after Voltaire and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, the former society still presented a resistance force against which the sects feared to break. This solidity was due to the Christian teaching that the Church had created and which spread throughout all classes of society, even in the most remote rural areas, the fundamental knowledge from which the science of life derives present, the elevation of thoughts and the love of the institutions of the country.

Since the 16th century, the Jesuits had occupied the first rank in Christian teaching, through the marvelous appropriation of their methods adapted to the needs of the new times, and by the way which they knew how to inspire in their disciples, in different countries an enlightened patriotism. The France of Henry IV had established them poorly. despite the jealousies of their rivals and the opposition of their enemies of orthodoxy, and their numerous educational institutions were so many seminars of loyalty to the Church and the monarchy.

That is precisely why people gathered against the

"In 1752, a member of their society, Father Raffay, professor of philosophy professor in Ancona, informed his superiors of the following singularity boasts. An English lord, a Freemason of the highest ranks, who was travelling through Italy, having met this religious man under the report of a man of letters, and appearing to have taken it in particular af- affection, confided in him that, still young and free, he would do well to to consider obtaining a state, because little, and surely before In twenty years, his society would be destroyed. The Jesuit, astonished by this tone of as- sure, asked the advisor as punishment for what cry "My order would have to suffer a similar fate. By subjecting, in the name of God, all Christians to a pope and All men have kings, you hold the universe in chains. You will pass The first ones; after you, the despots will have their turn (2).

One of the high-ranking followers of philosophical Freemasonry, d'Alem- Bert, he indicated, a few years before the abolition of the Jesuits, the the goal pursued by the sect:

Another reason makes me very eager to see, as they say, their heels: that is, the last Jesuit who will leave the kingdom will lead with him the last Jansenist in the coach basket; The hardest part will be done when philosophy is freed from the great grenadiers of fanaticism and intolerance; the others are merely

And again d'Alembert in 1759:

"A few days ago, I had a visit from a very honest Jesuit, to whom

I gave good advice: I told him that his company had made a big mistake in to fall out with you, that she would feel bad about it, that she would have the obligation to their fine Journal de Trévoux and to their fanatical Berthier. My Jesuit, who apparently doesn't like Berthier and who isn't from the newspaper, applauded my remonstrances. This is very unfortunate, me he said. – Yes, very unfortunate, my PR, I replied, because you You didn't need new enemies... Farewell, my dearest and illustrious Dear master, I commend you to your good intentions and to the rabble I follow tic, and the Jansenist rabble, and the Sorbonne rabble, and the in- rabble tolerant. » ®

"Ah! poor brothers!" Voltaire wrote again in 1760, "patience! We are not discouraged!... Hérault said one day to one of the brothers: You will not destroy the Christian religion. – We shall see about that. said the other one.

Then in 1761, August 4: "We are overwhelming the Jesuits, and we are doing well; But we let the Jansenists sleep, and we do wrong; it would be necessary, for to find the middle ground and to take a moderate and honest stance, strangle the author of the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques (Jansenist journal), with Brother Berthier's entrails. – It is reported that three Jesuits were finally burned. in Lisbon; this is very comforting news, but it's a Jansea the ist who commands them. – I'm not sorry that Malagrida was burned, But I feel very sorry for the half-dozen Jews who were burned alive.

Finally, in one of those jokes he titled: Excerpt from the London Gazette, and that it dates from February 20, 1762, after having accumulated in the millions and millions by the foundations Benedictines, Bernardines, Carthusians, Premonstratensians and the Carmelites, ridiculing them at length, and pointing them out as the enemies of the fatherland, if they did not voluntarily submit the use of these riches to build warships for the nation, and if they did not send their novices and professed members to serve as cabin boys and sailors in the French fleet, he adds in conclusion: "For the Jesuit brothers, it is not considered that they should seize to take this opportunity, given that France will be incessant- "The purging of the said brothers (1)."

Comparing these insults, these ferocious joys worthy of Robes Pierre and Marat, with the laudatory testimonies given in other occasions by these young men, with the value of information Jesuit order, it is clearly demonstrated that one does not worked to destroy them only to arrive everywhere at destruction of the Catholic religion, of any religion, and of any nation nationality, according to the supreme goal of secret societies. Also the pre-President of Éguilles, of the parliament of Aix, who had attended all the debates that preceded the ruling of his court, and which had opposed it poised, with all the magistrates who were there, truly Catholics, he said to the king at Versailles:

"If the Church is constantly outraged by the judgments rendered" against the Jesuit institute, the throne is even more directly attacked that by the two main motives that led their enemies to their destruction. The first of these motives was clearly to remove education the movement of children and especially people of quality to a society entirely royal list. The second motive, as dangerous as the first, was to astonish all the other bodies of the kingdom by the terrifying fall of him who seemed the most unshakeable, and to make them feel by this that hatred The protection of parliaments is more to be feared than the protection of the king. search (1).

to be a philosophical weapon by receiving the patriarch's embrace in Ferney... Frederick summoned Voltaire to his court in 1750, naming him his chamberlain. Bellan gave him one of his orders and a pension of twenty thousand francs. In Moscow, the Empress was concerned about the speeches or the silence of Voltaire; at Fontainebleau, Christian VII, King of Denmark, honored himself would have been in front of Louis XV for having learned to think from Voltaire; Gustav III, hoping to be admired by philosophers, he solemnly renounced to arbitrary power; Joseph II, like a true 18th-century prince, said against the priests, these fiery edicts, and put at the service of ideas the arm of a Germanic Caesar... Voltaire was able to write to Daraila-town: I have three kings, fourth. He was supposed to win this big game. tie (1). »

It was a little after the century had reached its midpoint that the a long-standing plot hatched in the depths of the lodges became a open conspiracy. Thirty years of philosophical teaching and the perversion of morals had prepared public opinion to witness, by tagged or powerless, to the explosion of slander that preceded the actions of parliaments and courts already filled for a long time time by the followers. (See book II, chapter III, paragraph 4.)

In Portugal, Spain, France, Italy, and throughout Europe whole, everywhere spread in large quantities the libels, the pamphlets, the reports, the stories, the essays on sheets of paper, in brochures, in books. The facts, the assertions, the texts, the translations, testimonies, teachings, wishes and the virtues, constitutions and rules, laws and edicts, everything was truncated, altered, disguised, invented, or deleted. Every effort was made to increase the noise and darkness. Diderot, in a letter to Father Castel, and J.-J. Rousseau, in his letter to the Archbishop of Paris, asserts that one They hired them, they were even offered memoranda and money to write against the Jesuits, and they refused. The president Rolland, of the Parliament of Paris, in a letter dated October 8 1778, and in a memorandum for the inheritance of his uncle, deposed the sitaire of Perrette's box, which the Jansenists had taken from him vée, did not hesitate to publish that the matter was solely the responsibility of the Jesu demolishing and rebuilding the colleges had cost him money. sixty thousand pounds, and he added in truth that the Jesuits would not have been achieved, if he had not devoted his life to this work time, his health, and his money.

Finally, to conclude with a general observation, the Calvinist Sis-Mondi cannot help but make this admission: "The chorus of accusations tions and most often calumnies that we find against the "The Jesuits in the writings of that time have something frightening about them (1)." This was the watchword given by Calvin: Jesuitæ vero qui se maxime nobis opponunt aut necandi, autsihoc convenient fieri non potest ejiciendi, aut certe mendaciis et calumnjis oppui-Mendi sunt. Perfected by Freemasonry, this motto has extended to everything that is truly social and has embraced most of the intelligences in a vast network of lies of all kinds.

Freemasonry then had the skill to assume the guise of public good and devotion to religion and the king.

The executors of his plan were, in Portugal, Carvalho Marquis of Pombal; in France, the Duke of Choiseul, the concubine royal Pompadour, and the slim majority of the principal parliaments; in Spain, the Count of Aranda and the Duke of Alba; in Naples, Marquis Bernardo Tanucci.

II. – POMBAL AND THE DESTRUCTION OF THE JESUITS IN PORTUGUESE

Carvalho, known as Pombal, a man without morals or scruples, skeptic in action (1), as Mr. de Saint-Priest speaks, had showed a strong inclination towards libertinism and had gone through all the excesses of impetuous youth. "Still young, after having en raised a young girl of blue blood (or of the first nobility), he had married her before the eyes of the indignant nobility; supple and Bold at the same time, he had tried in vain to calm the hidalgos and to be adopted by them: all his efforts had failed, and It was from that day that, deep in the earth, he swore the ruin of those he "He had been unable to assimilate." POMBAL AND THE DESTRUCTION OF THE JESUITS

"Although he had pretended through one or two diplomatic documents to be an enemy of the English, he was not, said M. de Saint-Priest, opposed to Great Britain only in words, and was always submissive to it. Indeed. While he loudly proclaimed the freedom of Portugal, he the city of Porto was stirred by the establishment of the company that delivered The English have a monopoly on wines. It is even a tradition in the political world in Lisbon, that these boasts were sometimes confirmed with the London cabinet to serve as a veil for complaints (1).

This devotion, this subservience, was such that when the France, at the time of the family pact, proposed to the king Portugal, due to the common origin of the houses of Bourbon and of Braganza, to renounce its ties with England To enter into the Bourbon alliance, Pombal replied: That the king, his master, would sell even the roof tiles of his palace. rather than endure such humiliating conditions. Is it astonishing, absurd, after that, according to M. de Saint-Priest, that Chevriér, who had written the life of Marshal de Bellisle, negotiator and French minister at that time, had him say in his political testament: "We know that the Duke of Cumberland had flattered to become King of Portugal. Such a conjecture, far from being absurd, can alone explain Pombal's conduct, and M. de Saint-Priest seems to confirm it adding: "It is no less true that the Portuguese minister Gays was linked with the Whig party and especially with Lord Chatham.

Pombal, to marry, according to the wishes of his grandfather, John V, his Uncle Dom Pedro, leaves no doubt about such an important fact both in Pombal's conspiracy against the Catholic religion and the fundamental laws of the kingdom, which excluded from succession to the crown any foreign prince, especially non-Catholic.

"This is the Providence memo," reads the speech sent to Pope Pius VII by the queen herself, who miraculously preserved VM against the repeated shocks that reduced Portugal to consternation the most deplorable nation. Its all-powerful arm annihilated powerful stratagems, so that VM would have as her husband the august monarch who... currently governs... Finally, Providence preserved VM from several attacks and infamous machinations formed against the legitimacy of his right. "

Pombal's panegyrist, M. de St-Priest, is obliged to say himself:

However, the Jesuits were divided into three parts. The novices These scholastic and first vows were submitted by Pom-bal, without any semblance of procedure, to all kinds of promasses, threats and vexations designed to bring them to renunciation of their vocation. The professed were cast out onto the land of the Pope, in Italy, with the first ones, who largely refused majority to apostatize. Packed by the hundreds into ships of trade, exposed to all kinds of weather, without provisions, where Bread and water were deliberately lacking; they were thrown out one after another. Driven by the winds, in the ports of Spain, they were abundantly rescued, and finally to Civitavecchia, where they were greeted with admiration. Three times these transports were renewed velent; the last consisted of missionaries brought from the Kaffraria, Brazil, Malabar, from all the places where they spread linked civilization with the Catholic faith. Only, more two hundred, including several French, Italians, Germans, were held captive to satisfy Pombal's rage in the dungeons of the Tagus, where 81 perished from misery and suffering (2).

of the Pope and the Catholic religion. However, the complete destruction of an order religious, so strongly constituted, and which, widespread in both hemispheres spheres, supported and propagated on all sides the purity of the faith and the the fullness of this apostolic authority became the primary condition of a similar project: he therefore devoted himself to it with all the activity of his mind fueled by intrigue and fraud (1).

The historian of sects and secret societies, Mr. Lecoulteux de Canteleu expressed himself thus:

"The Duke of Choiseul's need to become popular, the a childish tendency of his caustic and incredulous mind drove him towards the protection of doctrines then called philosophical. He let himself go to the sweet and proud conviction that he was a strong spirit, a friend of Enlightenment and progress. For their part, the philosophers had descended to the lowest degree of baseness towards him. No praise was too much for them, provided that the power withdrew its hand from religious faith and left the society was becoming corrupted by the progress of the Encyclopedia. This was during the last two years of the Choiseul ministry that were published the most abominable books, not only against religion, but still against public morality and against all principles of governance of formation and civilization. D'Argens, d'Holbach, Helvétius, lived in Choiseul's company, and this was with the help of the Foreign Affairs department that even the worst books found a way to circulate (2).

Voltaire, their great master, was not ashamed of him to write :

Moreover, contemporary accounts have revealed the morality of the minister and the courtesan. They were the principal authors Seditious resistance from parliament to the monarchy. Choiseul, although a minister, he even had the insolent audacity to respond to large dolphin that he might have the misfortune of becoming his subject, but that he would never be his servant, and Mr. de St-Priest admits that the responsibility would have been his downfall in wngou-

As for parliaments, their certificate of affiliation can also be found. Masonic-philosophical correspondence between Voltaire and d'Alembert, in the pilgrimages to Ferney of the councilors and masters very many requests, and in the numerous letters to the principals members of these courts, we might have added, if he had been born necessary to join them to the first ones. The story of the rest and the Historical records also leave no doubt about this point :

"The most dangerous enemies of the Jesuits," said M. de St-Victor, "are those which could most effectively serve the revenge of the favorite (at subject of the absolution they had refused her unless she left the court), were in parliament. We saw that there was the heart of it of Jansenism, and that the philosophical sect also had its parties there without. It was Berryer, son of an attorney general, one of the creatures lodge and the intimacy of Frederick, finally a regular courtier of Voltaire: that is the clerical advisor chosen by the upright parliament of Paris to strike down the lax morals of the Jesuits and anathematise as an attack on the Church and its general councils their institute, declared pious by the ecumenical council of Trent.

La Chalotais: Attorney General of the Parliament of Rennes, "was famous," says Michd's International Biography, "for a criminal trial that divided the court and the parliaments of the kingdom, brought about the overthrow of the high magistracies, and was the era of the most serious attack on royal authority before the Revolution resolution of 1789. He was linked with the philosopher Duclos, his companion Triote, a friend of d'Alembert, Abbé Mably and other people of Letters "very much of the same species."

Of all the reports against the Jesuits, that of La Chalotais caused the greatest sensation; and this sensation, said M. de St-Victor, was prodigious; people snatched it up, they devoured it. On these pages, people believed all these infamies, only to be met with silence from the Insitut (1). Now here, according to a well-informed witness, was the origin of the famous report.

Abbot Gorgel recounts that he was at Prince Louis's house de Rohan (whom the sect regarded as a follower) at a dinner to which M. de La Chalotais had been invited, and where were Among the guests gathered were Buffon, Duclos, d'Alembert and Marmontel.

"Someone, wanting to curry favor with the presumed author of the Account - Having become fashionable, he steered the conversation towards the Jesuits. Mr. de La Chalotais, who knew his diatribe by heart, did a very good job of delivering it.

Everything was complete; it seemed everyone was convinced that M. de La Ghalotais was not the author of his report (1). »

Public opinion attributed the writing to Tarai of the Attorney General, d'Alembert, and that was not the least because of its success. In any case, here is what d'Alembert said about it. he himself wrote to the great master Voltaire, March 31, 1762:

"You haven't told me anything about Mr. de La Ghalotais's memorandum. It is, at In my opinion, a terrible book against the Jesuits, especially since it is Done with moderation. It is the only philosophical work that has been done "So far against this rabble."

Voltaire's responses to the Attorney General are too A faithful analysis of the report, which reveals its spirit all too well, as well as the origin and common plan of the entire plot against the Jesuits and the colleges, so that we do not mention them main passages.

We will say nothing in particular about the Reports of Messrs. Riquet, Cantelauze, and Chalvet in Toulouse, Charles in Rouen, Dudon in Bordeaux, Castillon in Aix, Joly de Fleury in Paris, Sallèles to the council of Roussillon, Tolozan to Lyon, Servan to Grenoble. All are written in the same spirit: same truncated texts. Whether proven or falsified, the same contradictions, the same calumnies, even opposition to the Pope and the clergy, announcing a common source and the same conspiracy.

No sooner had the denunciation of Abbé Chauvelin been pronounced, said M. de St-Victor, that all the party's printing presses had seized upon it; it had been spread abundantly throughout the provinces, and to this. With the agreed signal, everything had begun to ferment in the other rooms. comments. Three lawyers and public prosecutors, Joly de Fleury in Paris, Montclar in Aix, La Chalotais in Rennes, had immediately set to the work; a Jansenist workshop, established at the Blancs-Manteaux, their provided materials, compounds, according to the traditions of polemic from the sect, from altered, isolated, truncated, falsified texts; from pens more exercised than those of these magistrates were employed in donning these deceitful compositions of all the prestige of oratory and the most energetic forms of satire. This is how they published Reports; the writer chosen to polish the work of La Chalotais had proven to be the most skillful and eloquent. It was the count the rendering that caused the biggest sensation (2).

The Jesuits were therefore expelled from their colleges and condemned

(1) As for the ancient disinterestedness of Mr. Ripert de Montclar, here is what he had written by Mme du Defland, October 19, 1769, following consequently all the services rendered by him to philosophical Freemasonry:

Monsieur de Montclar was the other day at the home of the Duke of Choiseul, who told him: I congratulate you on the pension of 5,000 francs that the king is giving you. Foreign affairs. Then he went to Mr. Le Ckaucelior, who said to him: I am making you my compliment on the annual bonus the king gives you at the Stalls from Provence. Then he went to Mr. de St-Plorentin's house, who said to him: I am giving you. He complimented you on the reimbursement the king made for your expenses; he wanted to go to the Bishop of Orléans (the mason from Jaucourt, later an apostate), hoping for a compliment on the gift of some benefice. » (Letters of Mme du Deffand, tome I, p. 339).

We are pleased to report here that Montclar, before dying, expressly retracted all the impious and slanderous writings that had appeared under his name, and wanted that his letter be published or preached by the vicar of his parish. The bishop d'Apt had a report drawn up which he sent to the sovereign pontiff, in reparation of the outrages committed against the Holy See.

It is, I believe, the first since the foundation of the monarchy, no one has dared to strangle it for having had his say. But it is also claimed that at supper at the Mathurins' house He had gone a bit overboard with the Abbé de Chauvelin. This makes the case more serious, and it is good that these gentlemen teach people how to speak (1).

For the destroyers in France, they wanted, in the manner of victorious, to erect a monument that would serve both to transmit to posterity and the names of the victors and the consequences of the victory. In any case, the creditors The priests did not profit from their spoils; they were consumed in expenses that the legal wrangling and the agents of parliament rendered useless. The first legal fees for a single college were paid. 50,000 francs. The straightforward recovery of a sum of 500 francs incurred 600 francs in fees, and a bailiff, guardian-sequestrator of a considerable college, he told anyone who would listen that he wouldn't give up his winnings for 12,000 francs. We tried even to smuggle entire libraries in a foreign country to sell them there (1).

Maury was also able to say to the Constituent Assembly, in the discussion on Church property:

"A fairly recent event demonstrates the drawbacks of these tax rules:" When the Jesuits were suppressed, their opulence was praised everywhere; No sooner were their possessions in the hands of the sequestrators than they... proved insufficient to pay the indecently meager pension which had been promised to them. 68 THE DESTRUCTION OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

O Freemasonry, this is indeed your thought, your secret, and your style!

The Duke of Alba, Huercar, shared these ideas. Minister of Fer Dinand VI, he had made himself the apostle of innovations and the instigator of the hatred against the Jesuits. His intrigues had just overturned the ministry of Ensinada, the Colbert of Spain, whose probity, Work and the economy had just restored the navy, the com Spanish trade and finance (1).

"Two years after the suppression of the Jesuits in France, in 1766, It was Spain's turn, wrote M. de Saint-Priest. They were then carrying to Madrid of large hats with long wings, similar to the one that Beaumarchais gives it to Basile. In the fervor of the reforms, who then applied to small things as well as great ones, King Charles III wanted to abolish them. The confessions made to the Grand Inquisitor of Spain by the Duke of Alba before dying, as the instigator of this riot, with the intention to blame it on the Jesuits, confessions sent in writing to Charles III himself, says the journal of the Protestant Christophe de Murr, leave no doubt about the origin of this movement po pulaire.

Because it went unpunished, it was forgotten. Only Aranda, chief of the council, Moifino, Roda and Campomanès, junior ministers, conferred between them by singular and almost romantic means. It's just too much absurdity and injustice all in all It seems! Therefore, no historian adheres to this fabric of in-probabilities and impossibilities.

"Since 1764," recounts the Prussian historian, the Protestant Schœll, The Duke of Choiseul had expelled the Jesuits; he persecuted this order. even as far as Spain. Who wouldn't notice that this is already the entire educational plan that Freemasonry wants to see triumph in France and that it has just established in Belgium? (Book II, Chapter XII, § 7, and ... XIII, § 3). Who could deny the persistence of the designs of the sects yourselves and the enduring tradition that they pass on?

The proud parliamentarian, filled with contempt for the people, who is the core of Masonic doctrine, which primarily seeks to destroy the popular schools:

To take control of youth education and instruction in order to to direct it early towards the end of Freemasonry, destruction of the Catholic religion, of any religion and of any nationality, Such was the plan devised by the secret societies and which had began the destruction of the Jesuits and their colleges.

It is in accordance with these instructions that everywhere the brothers undertook the reform of education, after the destruction of the Jesuits. Pombal naturally began at the university of Coimbra.

"In a work he published on this university, says the Bio-Michaud's universal graphy (1), he attributed to the Jesuits a rather strange: it was that of the decadence of the sciences and the arts, which there flourished before them. Having thus prepared public opinion, he He was appointed by the king with the title of lieutenant-general for this reform, and followed by a large and distinguished retinue, he went to Coimbra on the 15th September 1772. He changed several professors, as well as the system general studies, gave new statutes, assigned a kind of preeminence to the physical and mathematical sciences, called for at great expense foreign scholars (Protestants and non-believers) and increased the endowment and the privileges of university life.

It was following his affiliation with a lodge of this kind, and then that, obeying the voice of his conscience, he had just broken with her, that the unfortunate M. de Lescure, the father of the hero of the Vendée, met his death. Mr. de Haugwitz later stated that the book of Errors and the truth was the key to all the events of the Revolution, and Mr. de Maistre, who foresaw certain happy effects of the shock caused to minds by these doctrines in the countries Protestants, essentially agreed with Barruel and Robison when he wrote, in 1810, in his memoir on illuminism:

It is important to note that the Martinists derive their name not from Saint-Martin, the unknown, but indeed "by a certain Martin-Pasquale, who once lived quite a long time" in France, and who died in America perhaps forty years ago. > That would place the creation of this sect around 1760. Mr. de Maistre's statement has a great weight, for he had made a particular study of this subject. Having himself been even received as a Freemason before the revolution in Chambéry, while so many honorable people were members of the lodges; he could have had many sources of information, as can be judged from the extract above.

$9 THE PREPARATION FOR THE REVOLUTIONARY EXPLOSION

The occasion to which Mr. de Maistre refers here was probably the meeting in Lyon, in 1778, of a general assembly of the illuminating lodges, under the name of the Convention of the Gauls, an appellation which events would later reveal their meaning. The lodges, the Swiss consuls were represented there and forged alliances and relations which, in 1795, singularly facilitated the French invasion of the Swiss (book II, chapter VI, sections 7 and 12) (1).

IV. – ORGANIZATION OF THE MASONIC ORDER

in Germany

Germany, as we have seen (Book II, Chapter II, Section 2) had been the cradle of the Masonic sect. Throughout the 18th century, all sorts of Templar sects, secret orders, continued to work its upper classes, its clergy in particular, while that English Freemasonry was spreading in parallel. Father Pachtler showed how from the beginning of the 18th century a naturalist movement, absolutely analogous to deism in English, occurred in this country. The Conscienciarier sect, delshonm, violently attacked Christianity and all revelation positive lation. In 1751, an impious work, dedicated to Frederick II, of Prussia, published as a title illustration the scene of adoration of a prostitute, which was to take place on 20 Brumaire 1793 on the altar of Notre-Dame de Paris (2) 1

The great literary renewal which at the end of the century liberated Germany was led to exclude from servile imitation of foreigners sively by writers imbued with these ideas and belonging to the Masonic sects. In a letter from the famous Metastasios, written to Prince Chigi On June 19, 1768, we see that he already sensed in Vienna the a great catastrophe that threatened the civil and religious edifice in Europe jeux. He complains mainly (which is quite remarkable) that the object of those who would have had the power to bring about rest was precisely the disturbance and the novelty (2).

In Germany, too, Freemasonry had attracted princes to its mysteries. After Frederick of Prussia and most of the princes These Protestants, even the Catholic princes themselves had allowed themselves to seduce. François de Lorraine, the husband of Marie-Thérèse, had been initiated in 1731, in The Hague, in a lodge under the presidency the Earl of Chesterfield's denunciation. Thanks to this secret protection, despite the papal bulls of Clement XII and Benedict XIV, despite the edict From the reign of Emperor Charles VI (1738), Freemasonry spread silently within the Empire.

Crétineau-Joly recounts how Catholic principles were shaken within the Empire by the machinations of two dangerous followers:

Marie-Thérèse demonstrates the desire to have two practitioners near her trained by Boerhaave's lessons, she sets as her only condition that they will be Catholic. Doctors Girard Van Swieten and Antoine de Haen were from that small, restless flock, which were

Van Swieten was one of the members of the lodge where François of Lorraine had been received as a mason; hence their relationship and the considerable influence exerted in Austria by a Dutch doctor canopy (2).

These pernicious seeds of heresy were developed by the son of Marie-Thérèse and François de Lorraine. Affiliated from his Young people in the lodges, Joseph II completely devoted himself to advice The advanced Freemasons. The destruction of religious orders, Amid the large number of German sects, projects sinister signs were already appearing, and they had to be well aware so that in 1766, Joseph II himself felt compelled to defend under the most severe penalties the Rosicrucian order (1). There had therefore already prepared many elements when the famous Weishaupt gave this plot a central focus by creating the Order of enlightened ones, who exerted a decisive influence on events from that era.

Adam Weishaupt was born in Bavaria in 1748. He had at He was barely twenty-eight years old when he was given a chair of law. canon at the University of Ingolstadt. It was therefore resolved to hold a meeting or court general wind of deputies from all Masonic rites of the unit towards, to put more activity into the work, more more together safe walking, and to reach the goal more safely and quickly common: a universal revolution. Wilhelmsbad, in Hanau, near the town of that name and two or three leagues from Frankfurt on the Mein, was chosen as the meeting place. Of all the general assemblies held for twenty years by the freemasons lessons, none yet had approached that of Wilhelmsbad, either because of the number of chosen ones, or because of the variety of sects from which It was taking shape. Weishaupt's Illuminism had two of its members there. It was first Kniggc, whose name in the sect was Philon, the place a follower of Weishaupt, the great organizer of the new rite, and Without a doubt the most capable of its members. He had been a member of parliament. to the Hessian convent by his former colleagues from the Templar lodges. His second-in-command was sent directly by Weishaupt and his sect, Baron Dittfurt, whose name in the sect was Minos. Kniggc could have taken his place in the assembly and attended his deliberations; but foreseeing all that they would be, he believed

By tracing this first attachment that, Knigge took care to learn himself, in his Last clarifications, which changed his approach:

"I confess," he said, "that I still harbored a secret inclination towards my former brothers of the strict observance. I had already enlightened one of them so many that I flattered myself that I could bring their system together at

Stung by this disdain, Knigge believed himself absolved of his oaths and of all duty towards his former colleagues. No longer flattering himself Instead of training all the members at once, he resolved to attack them. one by one and then to gain the whole body, lodge by lodge (2). »

He agreed with Assessor Minos that henceforth all their Attention, with regard to the congress, would be reduced to two objects: one was to prevent any measures that could be taken against Illuminism; the other, to obtain everything that could amen to establish, a little earlier, a little later, his dominance in the lodges Masonic. The entire mission given to Brother Minos was therefore to work towards having it decreed:

"Strengthened by the protection of the victor of Creveld and Minden, Ferdinand of Brunswick, the Martinist deputies at the congress of Wilhelmsbad, of which this prince was president, Saint Martin and La Chappe de la Heuzière spared nothing, neither they nor their agents, to triumph there; they were supported, and their victory would have been infallible. easily completed without the large number of MPs already won by Knigge (with whom, however, they came to an understanding and formed an alliance), said Mr. Lecoulteux of Canteleu (1).

In Germany, an event, arranged by Providence as a final warning to the monarchies, almost interrupted the The sect's progress. Jealousy sparked a violent rift. between Weishaupt and Knigge. Furthermore, the Elector of Bavaria, in quiet about the underground machinations of what he believed to be Freemasonry the actual order, ordered the closure of all the lodges. The Illuminati, believing themselves already strong enough to resist the edict of the voter, refused to comply. Chance led to the discovery of the a sect whose existence was completely unsuspected. A minister A Protestant man named Lanze was struck by lightning in July 1785. Instructions were found on him stating that he was tasked, in his capacity as an enlightened individual, with traveling to Silesia, to visit the lodges and to inquire, among other things, about their opinion on the persecution of Freemasons in Bavaria.

Having been put on the trail, the government conducted a thorough investigation. Abbots Cosandey and Renner, and the court councilor Utschneidei* and the academician Grünberger, who had withdrawn from the order as early as that they had experienced all the horror of it, made a judicial deposition Ridiculous. He was initiated at Bruns. Wick's final mysteries of Illuminism by Mauvillon, worthy student of Knigge and then professor at the Carolin college (1).

Long before this initiation, Mirabeau knew all the secrets sources that Masonic lodges offered for a revolution.

"In 1776," said Henri Martin, "the young Mirabeau had drawn up a plan reforms, where he proposed that the Masonic order work with moderation, but with resolve and sustained activity, to transform progressively the world, to undermine despotism, to pursue emancipation civil, economic, religious passion, the full conquest of freedom individual (2).

Mirabeau knew how to appreciate all the new resources that the Weishaupt's genius had been able to draw on the organization for a revolution nization of Freemasonry.

Upon returning to France, he began by introducing himself the new mysteries in the lodge of the Philaloths, of which he was already one of the main members. His first colleague there was

He would soon leave the capital of Russia with twenty thousand more rubles, a gift from the importer Empress Catherine, correspondent of Diderot, Voltaire and d'Alembert, and the great protector of the Masonic lodges that he had founded in this city as well as in Mittau for men and for women. It was then that he appeared in Strasbourg, preceded by a extraordinary reputation, and armed with a colonel's commission issued by the King of Prussia. He founded new lodges there and made new proselytizing calves. From there he went to Lyon where he was received with great honors from the lodge of strict observance; there he founded with extreme luxury, that of triumphant wisdom, which was to to become the mother of all the others. All these childish things were not only intended to... to break with the nobility, the court, the army. They still served to create a treasure that would bear the initial brunt of the riots of 1789 and 1790.

Cagliostro, during his interrogation before the Holy Office, confessed that he led the sumptuous life we have just seen thanks to the funds provided to him by the fund of the Illuminati, and which he had received from Weishaupt the mission to prepare French Freemasonry. It was difficult to receive its direction.

Mirabeau himself, in the Prussian Monarchy, published before the events, he let slip a rather revealing admission on the subject significant:

"Freemasonry in general, and especially the Templar branch, pro spent enormous sums annually on reception expenses and contributions of all kinds: a portion was used as an expense his orders, but another very considerable amount flowed into a crate general, of which no one, except the first among the brothers, knows was the job (1). »

According to very reliable historical sources, the population in 1787 was: 703 lodges in France, 623 in Germany, 525 in England, 284 in Scotland, 227 in Ireland, 192 in Denmark, 79 in Holland Land, 72 in Switzerland, 69 in Sweden, 145 in Russia, 75 in Poland, 9 in Türkiye, 85 in North America, 129 in the possessions overseas missions of European States (2).

CHAPTER SIX

THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE AND EUROPE

1789–1800

I. – The Revolution as the result of a conspiracy.

"There's the victim!" exclaimed Mirabeau, one of the accomplices. of the conspiracy, by pointing the finger at Louis XVI, on the day of the opening of the Estates General (1). »

We have already reproduced several testimonies which we showed the conspiracy taking shape, starting in 1760 (Book II, Chapter III, Section 7). Here are now two contemporaries which will reveal to us how secret societies are the truth The tables of authors of the events of the revolution. The first is an English Freemason, John Robison, secretary of the Academy from Edinburgh, who published a book in 1797 entitled: Proofs of conspiracies against all religions and all governments elements of Europe, hatched in the secret assemblies of the illus mined and Freemasons.

"I had," he said, "the means to follow all the attempts made during for fifty years, under the specious pretext of enlightening the world with the torch of philosophy and to dispel the clouds of superstition religious and civil authorities were used to retain the entire population of Europe in darkness and slavery. I have observed the progress of these doctrines mingling and becoming increasingly intertwined with the various systems of Freemasonry; finally, I saw the formation of an association whose purpose the sole aim of destroying all establishments to their very foundations religious elements and to overthrow all existing governments in Europe. I saw this association spread its systems with such zeal argued that she had become almost irresistible, and I noticed that The figures who played the most part in the French Revolution were members of this association; that their plans were designed according to its principles and executed with her assistance. I became convinced that she It still exists, it still works silently, all the Appearances prove to us that not only are his emissaries striving to spread these abominable doctrines among us, but even that there in England there are lodges which, since 1784, have corresponded with the mother lodge. It's to unmask her, to prove that the ringleaders were deceitful men who preached a morality and a doctrine of which they were familiar the falsehood and the danger, and that their true intention was to abolish all religions, to overthrow all governments and to make The whole world is a scene of pillage and murder, which I offer to the public an excerpt of the information I gathered on this subject.

An even more authoritative figure, the Korate of Haug-Witz, the Prussian minister, will give us more testimony precise, if possible.

It was 1822, the secret societies had just exploded sion in Spain, in Naples, in Piedmont, by as many movements revolutionary movements; the sovereigns, to guarantee and their crowns and true freedom among their peoples, had been united in congress in the city of Verona. It was then that the Count of Haugwitz, who had accompanied the King of Prussia there, informed the august assembly of a memorandum on secret societies, of which Here are some excerpts (1):

Freemasonry was then divided into two parties in its secret work. The light became more striking when I learned that Saint-Martin, the author of this publication, must have been and indeed was one of the coryphaeus of the chapter of Zion. There were attached all the sons who would develop later, to prepare and weave the mantle of the religious mysteries that people adopted to mislead the profane.

"I then became firmly convinced that the drama that began in 1788 and

But it may be wiser for the prince not to to break all ties with her.

II. – Regicide and the Masonic Convention of 1786

Mr. de Hugwitz's very specific allegation that the regicide had long ago decreed by secret societies, comes to receive unexpected confirmation: we now know that the first thought of the crime and assassination of Gustav III dates back to 1786, to the time of German Enlightenment and 'French Illuminism had undergone its fusion, as we have seen in the previous chapter. It is Cardinal Matthew, a man at cold judgment above all others, who first revealed it in a letter addressed to Mr. Robinet Cléry on April 7, 1875.

v II There is, in our countries, a detail that I can give you as Certainly. There was a meeting of Freemasons in Frankfurt in 1786. where two prominent men from Besançon were summoned who were part of the company: Mr. de Raymond, postal inspector, and Mr. Mayor of Ouligny, President of Parliament. He often recounted the event, and to me, and to others. You can see that the sect knows how to plan its attacks in advance: it's there, in Two words, his story.

Some time after Bishop Besson, former vicar-general of Besançon, now Bishop of Nîmes, thus completed this revelation:

"I can confirm his letter with details that are not without interest, and which were often recounted to me in Besançon, not only by Mr. President Bourgon, but by Mr. Weiss, the city librarian, member of the Institute, and the principal author of the Universal Biography, published under the name Michaud. COMPOSITION OF THE LODGES IN 1789

The march of the Revolution presents phenomena at every step strange behavior, absolutely inexplicable to those who do not hold do not take into account the actions of the companies Seerrotek acting without unveil.

While the assembly of notables had spoken at the press Although there was unanimity against doubling the third, the king was reluctant to grant months later, to the authorities of the Geneva-based Necker.

While, in the primary assemblies, the third estate rivaled knows with the nobility and the clergy to affirm his Catholic faith and his attachment to the monarchical government, and recorded it the authentic expression in the notebooks, the appointed deputies in these same assemblies would tear up these notebooks, vera-binding mandates, outside of which they were absolute lying without powers. Obviously in electoral operations, where hidden intrigue holds sway, the lodges had taken their revenge for the drafting of the monarchist cahiers, which they did not could have prevented it, because to do so would have required confronting a public discussion and ostensibly going against sentiment universal of the nation.

In the Lodge of Candor were, besides the deputies to the Grand-Orient, the Lamcths, Lafayette, the Marquis de Montesquieu, Moretonde Ghabrillan, Custine, Laclos, Latouchc, Sillery, d'Aiguillon, the Marquis of Lusignan, the Prince of Broglie, and generally the devoted Freemasons to the Duke of Orléans.

In the Lodge of the Nine Sisters, under the venerable Pastoret, one could distinguish The Duke of La Rochefoucauld was there, and, besides the deputies of the Grand Orient, Commander Delomieu, Lacépède, Bailly, Cerutti, Fourcroy, Millin, Bonne, Chateau-Randon, Chénier, Mercier, Gudin, Lametterie, the Marquis de la Salle, the apostate Noël, Dom Gerles, Rabaud St-Étienne, Petion, Fauchet and Goupil de Préfelu, who soon after passed to the Iron Mouth. One could still see Franklin, La Dixmerie, Gordot de St-Firmin, Mcslay, Delort, Bignon, Rémy, Mercier, Lalande, Dufresne, who had received Voltaire there.

To all these groups was added the Society of Friends of Blacks, formed later and which was to consist of all the followers imbued with the principles of modern philosophy; by naming the members of its regulatory committee, Condorcet, Mirabeau the Elder, Sieyès, Brissot, Carra, the Duke of Rochefoucauld, Clavière, The Pelletier de St-Fargcau, Valadi, La Fayette, etc., and by reading the From the speeches that were being given there, it was easy to see that it was indeed more than the advance of the whites, through a Wei--- revolution shaupt, than the redlancy of the blacks, and that the subscription of the two gold louis paid by each member was only a sub-side to join with the others to hasten their accomplishment (2).

All these names, most of them at least, already appeared in the lodges in Paris, the provinces, or abroad; and those who carried in France soon actively marked and in the French revolution and in the majorities of its assemblies.

There is more than just probability, and indisputable testimony blue, that of Bertrand de Molleville, the minister of Louis XVI, shows that all these crimes had been planned within the committee propaganda from the lodge of the United Friends:

In 1789, Mirabeau had communicated this plan to Chamfort who Marmontel shared this information. The indications given by the latter in his Memoirs are absolutely identical to those of M. de Molleville:

The meeting in which Duport communicated this abominable plan took place, he said Molleville, at the time of the reunion of the orders, that is to say at the end of June 1790. It was only in 1791 that Mirabeau made this revelation to M. de Montmorin, who He himself communicated it to his colleague, Mr. de Moiloville.

Louis Blanc, in Histoire de la Révolution française, vol. II, p. 318, attributes Duport was also responsible for organizing the massacres in Paris and the widespread panic due in the provinces.

The following passage, which can be found in the Journal of Travels in France, by Arthur Young, on January 18, 1790, confirms the appalling revelation by Bertrand de Molleville:

"Today, at dinner at the Duke of Liancourt's, the Count of Marguerite advanced "In front of nearly thirty deputies, an extremely serious matter: speaking of the vote on "Regarding the Toulon affair, he maintained that several members of parliament had openly and the champions, claiming that more insurrections were needed. through all the evils that the Revolution has unleashed upon the class working class, while the vast majority of the real people, who, in within the city, lived under the protective regime of these ins institutions, showed itself opposed to the revolution.

One of the most active instruments of the revolution of that era It was the National Guard. Its creator was Savalette de Lange. the director of the Grand Orient's correspondence chamber, whose Masonic activity we have seen (Book II, Chapter V, § 7). It is he who came to present to the Paris Commune a certain name a group of affiliates, equipped as soldiers, saying:

"Gentlemen, here are some citizens whom I have trained to handle" weapons for the defense of the homeland; I have not does their major or their general; we are all equal; I am merely a corporal, but I have set an example; order that all citizens follow him, that the nation take the "Weapons, and freedom is invincible."

What's surprising, after such origins, that the national guard has always been so dear to Freemasonry and that it has Introduced everywhere? It is the instrument born of all revolutions.

As if to clearly highlight the role that Freemasonry had in the events, when, after the storming of the Bastille, Louis XVI, obeying the Assembly, came to punish the riot by a solemn visit to the City Hall, all the leaders of the movement they lined up in his path and, joining their swords to- above his head, they formed the steel vault which is the sign of honor Masonic brother, and Moncau de St-Méry, haranguing him in the name of They all told him in lodge language: "You owed your A crown at birth, you now owe it only to your virtues (1).

It is worthwhile to report here the strange comparison that Ragon, the great officer The founder of the Trinosophists lodge, Cier du Gr.*. "Civil elections and the selection of voters were carried out according to the form used in Freemasonry. The manner of taking oaths, of obtaining the floor, of Requesting leave, filing a complaint, maintaining order, is obviously a matter of Freemasonry; only, in this latter case, the president's bell replaces the mallet. These practices became established all the more easily because almost all Educated French people are masons.

"The committees of the National Assembly recall the visitors and inspectors" that the Grand Orient sometimes addresses to the lodges.

"The annual contribution of each mason, to cover the expenses of the The masonic power gave rise to personal contributions in France.

VI. – Philippe-Égalité

The leader of this conspiracy, or at least the one in whose name The watchword was given everywhere, it was the Duke of Orléans, the grand master of most Masonic rites, like us We saw him in the previous chapter. He is the one Mirabeau was referring in the conversation with Chamfort to the person we had just to report. Since then, the truth has fully come to light on the participation of this unfortunate prince in all the crimes of the era that. A letter from him to Laclos, dated March 10, 1790, recounts Paris. There, he already uttered the word regicide in the midst of his naces against Louis XVI and the queen!!!

One sentence is particularly significant:

"George (the King of England) is not far from having relapses" yours; if it falls completely, you know what Fox and Grenville They promised me, everything would be fine then (1).

But the Girondins and the Jacobins, who had used the great Master of the Grand Orient, who wanted to overthrow Louis XVI, did not intend not to serve his ambition. The republic was proclaimed, and on February 22nd In February 1793, the unfortunate Philippe-Égalité submitted his resignation. of a grand master, saying "that he thought there should no longer be No mystery, no secret assemblies in a republic.

We have also seen that the vast majority of the Jacobin club, where Robespierre held sway, and the Cordeliers, where Danton held sway, was composed of Freemasons: therefore, one cannot deny that the odious, which resounded everywhere at that time, from the tribune, in the newspapers, in the clubs, were merely an echo of the cry of hatred against religion and the monarchy that had been promoted for a century in the lodges (1).

VII. – The European Revolution

However, the work of the Revolution was not to be limited to France. The Enlightenment had chosen it as the stage for the first explosion, as much to satisfy his particular hatred against the House of Bourbon, which was put at the service of the revolutionary cause, as to give the momentum and spirit of propaganda characteristic of the French people.

Freemasonry, through its universal ramifications, was also capable of paralyzing the coalition of kings and facilitating by the general betrayal of the success of the revolutionary armies.

At a meeting of the Propaganda Committee, on May 21, 1790, Duport, who held in his hands all the secrets of the conspiracy

(1) In 1792 at the Caon Jacobins club, the conventional Fauchet, évêque du Calvados, publicly pronounced this oath: "I swear implacable hatred to the throne and to the priesthood, and I consent, if he violates this oath, that a thousand daggers be used in my perjured breast, may my entrails be torn and burned, and may my bones of ashes, carried to the four sides of the universe, be a monument of the infidels." "Mr. de Mirabeau has very well established that the happy revolution which what has taken place in France must be and will be for all the peoples of Europe, the awakening of liberty, and, for kings, the sleep of death. I think like him in this respect, but I differ from him in the consequences. Those which he derives from this principle. It is indeed beyond doubt that, from what the way in which the kings of Europe and other tyrants of people in the various aristocracies, if our democratic constitution strengthens itself if it triumphs over its adversaries; in that case, it is out of doubt, I say, that our example makes the ruin of thrones inevitable, that Everywhere the people, excited by our example, will want to reign and that they will govern; but the previous speaker concludes from this principle that it is not a question Now, let us turn our gaze beyond our homeland, let it not be a question of than to strengthen the constitution there on unshakeable, assured foundations, as we must be, that the French constitution, once strengthened,

It seems to me that, in concluding in this way, the previous speaker starts from a This hypothesis, as ridiculous as it is false, is that the kings of Europe did not they do not think about the inevitable danger that threatens them and that none of them ha perceives its end in the strengthening of our constitution. But it is To attribute to kings a stupidity too desirable to be real. No, Gentlemen, no, this stupidity does not lull them to sleep on the brink of danger; they are plotting to overthrow our constitution; and our divided provinces, our Criminals and implacable enemies, whatever one might say, make this project very easy; it is unavoidable if we are content, as the the previous speaker, to remain on the defensive, if, by taking care of ourselves On our own, we let them form a coalition, if, without current fear on their part of their people, they employ them to raise up our king and to sacrifice us proud on the steps of the throne; if we do not help the Revolution in Their kingdoms, ours is lost, and we will become slaves, if We are leaving slaves in Europe.

"We must therefore hasten among our neighbors the same revolution which is taking place father in France. We will find two major advantages to this method to act offensively: the first to occupy the kings in such an active manner at home so they can't think about us; the second is to make us necessary allies of all peoples who will shake off the yoke and who, not not as far advanced in the Revolution as we are, find will provide us with moral and physical support.

Gela Not true, because it can't be. What are these movements?

It is important to inform them of our plans and their danger.

"You know what these much-vaunted movements amount to and to whom they are owed. Can one, in good faith, call this a true insurrection? No, gentlemen, no, you are not unaware of that.

Based on this data, it is impossible for me to believe in the lethargy of the kings at this moment; and when I hear you here assuring me that she is In reality, I only see that we have traitors among us. No, She does not exist, no, she cannot exist, and the darkness proves it. major events that need to be prevented ; for note that, if our Revolution is the cause of the people, our principles are also the cause of all kings, that is to say, these are the enemies of all thrones and of all the aristocracies of the universe.

Note that if Spain, Savoy, and Naples form a coalition, they will not remain isolated. Count on the Swiss aristocracies, on the emperor Prussia; all will eventually unite at the first one who... will attack. Thus our salvation will lie in the same revolution carried out within them, a revolution that should not be expected from our example alone, but that we must hasten so that ours may be accomplished. Finally, gentlemen, the The previous speaker's plan is defensive, mine is offensive: that's the difference.

"But how to act and on what? First, let's define this second point." Point: what should we act on? The answer is clear: on those we have the most to be feared, regarding Spain, Savoy, Italy and the Arsian cantons tocratic Switzerland. The reasons for this choice are obvious: it is among our neighbors and our primary enemies that a revolution must be carried out similar to our situation. How to act? This manifesto was sent to all the lodges, even those of An-England; it was especially so in Germany, where Emperor Joseph II He had a signed copy: Philippe d'Orléans. The professor Hoffmann, whom Freemasonry had long pressured with great praise for dedicating his pen to the cause of the Revolution

"That Mirabeau himself had declared to his confidants that he had in Germany a very extensive correspondence, but nowhere more important than in Vienna. He knew that the Revolution's system embraced the universe; that France was merely the chosen stage for a first explosion; that the propagandists were working on the people in all their forms the zones; that the emissaries were spread throughout the four parts of the world, and especially in the capital cities; that they had their supporters and sought to strengthen themselves especially in Vienna and the states tricksters. In 1791 he had read, and several other people with him, two letters, one from Paris and the other from Strasbourg, designating in cipher the names of the seven propaganda commissioners, based in Vienna, and to whom new commissioners had to turn, both for the salary of their work as for all the advice to be taken on their subject. He had seen several of these newspapers in hand which, leaving Vienna each week and filled with curious anecdotes against the court, of principles and arguments against the government, would carry all the poison of secret societies in the cities and towns of the empire worse, and in foreign countries, without those to whom they were addressed had ever subscribed and without ever being asked the price of port or subscription. He had even passed it on to the government some of these letters. He had revealed the purpose of the journeys that The enlightened Campe was making his mark in Paris, and his relations with d'Orléans and M Rabeau. He still knew, with absolute certainty, the plans of Mirabeau. of the Revolution. He entered into secret negotiations with the men from the Paris Commune and Dumouriez, an advanced Freemason himself—same, who was the commander-in-chief of the French army. These negotiations culminated in the retreat from Valmy, which revolutionary legend transformed into a victory, but which was nothing more than a shameful betrayal for both parties.

We now give the floor to Mr. Léon Pagès who recently cleared up this whole mystery:

"The King of Prussia learned, on the morning of September 20th, that major movements were taking place in the French camp established at Valmy. It was Kellsmann's corps; Dumouriez with 20,000 men were at Saint-Menchould, contained by the Prince of Liohenlohe who occupied Clermont.

XI. – The assassination of Gustave III.

It was not only through treason that the Revolution triumphed phait; it was still through all crimes and assassination.

The Convention seemed transformed into a lodge receiving a chef Valier Kadosh, when, a few days later, on August 26, Jean Dcbry proposed to the Legislative Assembly the legion of tyrannicides.

Will posterity believe, said Molleville, that this assembly of legislators, representatives of France, heard without horror the proposal to organize a corps of twelve hundred volunteer assassins, who would dedicate themselves to attacking individually and hand-to-hand all the kings who were at war with France, and their generals? Will she believe that this execrable proposal, put to a vote, was adopted?

The cowardly assassins soon took their revenge by murdering, without running any risk, the innocent, the unfortunate Louis XVI, his Sister Madame Elisabeth, Louis XVII, and the queen his mother.

The cowardice of the convention members alone prevented the formation of this legion. But the lodges had not waited for this project to to carry out assassinations against sovereigns, especially those who had committed themselves through Masonic oaths. The emperor of Germany, Joseph II, after having been so long and so effective protected Freemasonry and fought alongside it religion, had eventually become disillusioned and had died after taking some powerless measures against secret societies (2). His successor Leopold, who led the monarchist coalition against the Revolution (3), died poisoned on March 1, 1792 by the Neapolitan broth that had been prepared by Italian cooks, and fifteen days later, Gustav III, King of Sweden, who had thought for a long time he had a penchant for dealing with secret societies and Masonic orders (1), fell under the blows of a dome* Ankasloem's tic, one of the members of the Illuminati sect began the plundering of religious orders and the war against the Pope and his jurisdiction. It was even in Pistoia, in a secret meeting supported by all the authorities, that the decision took it upon himself to establish Masonic freedom and equality as the foundations of the Revolution. Freedom was, first and foremost, the liberation of the bishops from the authority of the Pope; and equality, that of the parish priests, priests and bishops, whose brothers they were, the nobles and the cooperators, and in whom resides all legislative power under the supremacy of princes or sovereigns. Later, enlightened by events, Leopold had banned all Masonic meetings in his states.

Legal documents filed in the archives of the house of Prussian authorities established that the crime had been planned by the lodges of Stockholm and in particular by the Duke of Södermanland, brother of the king. The pursuit formed the primary goal of the sects: the destruction of the papacy.

The high-ranking Freemason director Barras, after being machine-gunned by General Bonaparte and the armed sections of Paris against the Convention had appointed him to command the army of Italy. Transalpine Freemasonry had paved the way for him; The gates of the squares had opened freely, as we have as previously proven; the republics had formed from all parts. The betrayal was openly undermining what little remained.

“Bonaparte,” said Mr. Thiers, “had barely signed the capitulation of Mantua, that he had gone to Bologna to lay down the law to the Pope. The Directory would have liked him to finally destroy the temporal power of the Holy See; but he did not make it an obligation and left it free to act according to circumstances and his own will. But Bonaparte, who was preparing to cross the Alps again to march on Vienna, only wanted to wrest one or two more provinces from the Pope and the submit to a contribution sufficient to cover the costs of the new camera He therefore assembled his army at Bologna and marched against the seven to eight thousand men of the Pope, joined to the rural population who had gathered to defend only what remained of the territory technical, as he had been informed, and by way of parliament, the head of The small army. Cispadane legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and in addition the beautiful province of Romagna. The city and the important city of Ancona remained in the power of France until the General peace. The two provinces of the Duchy of Urbino and of Macerata, which the French army had invaded, were still appointed to the Pope, for the sum of 15 million. Similar sum still had to be paid, in accordance with the armistice of Bologna, not executed. These 30 million were payable two-thirds in silver and one-third in silver or precious stones. The Pope was also required to provide 800 draft horses and buffaloes, and other products from the territory of the Church. He had to disavow the assassination of Basseville, killed in the middle of a defended crowd by law and where he preached revolt, and to make them pay 300,000 francs both to his heirs and to those who had suffered as a result of the same event. All works of art and manuscripts, donated by the armistice of Bologna, were to be immediately directed towards Paris.

Such was the treaty of Tolentino which Consalvi, in his Memoirs, He called it the robbery, ladroneccio, so blatant was the injustice of the aggression, origin and cause of the treaty. While the Churches are being stripped, and the people are being oppressed, to Faced with such unjust conditions, General Bonaparte wrote went to Joubert:

Bonaparte and the temporal power of the Pope 179

Let us follow its developments through its various phases.

First, let's note that she didn't just understand the destruction of the temporal, but also that of the spiritual, and that The Directory, not content with so many unjust stipulations, exn still grieved, albeit in vain, from the pontiff's conscience, the retraction the issuing of briefs that condemned the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, drowned in blood so many times, no longer even in France of authority for no one, and that the director Laréveillère-Lépeaux he himself strove to replace theophilians with his religion thropes.

However, Joseph Bonaparte, the general's older brother, had just arrived to be appointed, as a consequence of the Treaty of Tolentino, ambassador The Directory in Rome. Amid rumors of the Pope's illness, the general prescribed to him (September 22), "if the Pope were to die, to do everything possible to prevent another one from being made, and to incite a revolution." Count de Robiano, in its continuation of the History of the Church of Bérault-Bercastel, even asserts that, in his instructions to his brother, the general he told him, speaking of the papacy, "that the old idol would be annihilated, and that is what freedom and politics willed (1). »

The Directory, for its part, wrote to its ambassador on the 10th October, two and a half months before Duphot's death: "You You have two things to do: 1. Prevent the King of Naples from coming in Rome; 2° to help, far from retaining the good dispositions of those who would think that it is time for the reign of the popes to end Nice; in short, to encourage the momentum that the people of Rome seem "to take towards freedom (2)."

"How, moreover," said Mr. Thiers, "can we prevent the democrats..." The French, Ligurians, and Cisalpine peoples did not correspond with the democrats. Piedmontese, Tuscans, Romans and Neapolitans, and did not whisper to them the fueled by their opinions, their encouragement, and their hopes?... They were stirring up revolt throughout the Roman state; they did not count on it yet a large number of supporters.

ignorant, incapable bachelors, strangers to the knowledge of things human beings, true citizens versed in the practice and habit of world? However, the democrats were few in number; they inspired prejudices regarding religion, of which they were believed to be (1).

As a consequence of these instructions from the Directory, Joseph Bonaparte one day left a considerable number of discontented people gathered in his apartments and in his courtyard. We do not speak of the Pope, what a revolution. "Tomorrow we will change the government: "We don't need a pope; let's return to the Roman Republic." "She will restore to us the qualities of the Scipios and the Gracchi."

A riot broke out to overthrow the government. Bonaparte, said Consalvi, then Minister of Arms to His Holiness; the General Duphot, an ardent and republican young man, began to lead the riot. They were shouting: Liberty! Long live the French Republic! A Down with the Pope! And in the evening, a little before sunset, The riot advanced against a patrol of papal soldiers, and pursued her to her neighborhood, which she abandoned along with the post entirely, unable to resist the armed multitude who came to attack them, and to take refuge under the Settima Gate - Bonaparte and defend themselves there. A large multitude wearing French cockades The Frenchwoman went there again; she had at her head two Frenchmen, swordsmen naked, cockades in hand. One of them was inviting the Pope's troops into shouting: Forward! Come on, courage! Long live liberty! I am your general. And as they kept approaching the soldiers to disarm them, after having repeatedly ordered them to They laid down their weapons, opened fire, and killed several, and among them, the one who marched at the head, General Duphot, who came to Rome to marry a sister of Bonaparte. He thus perished in a riot that he himself incited against the recognized authority. This fact was so proven, and Duphot's guilt so obvious, that Bonaparte, successor to Joseph Bonaparte, writing in 1801 to the First Consul, and having to speak about the alleged assassination, could not to refrain from saying to him: "You know, as do I, the details of this deplorable event. No one in Rome has given Orders to shoot or kill anyone. General Duphot has He was imprudent, let's be frank, he was guilty; there was Rome has a law of nations like everywhere else (2).

That was all it took to expose the conspiracy. All the apologies, all the offers of reparations, were rejected, although there were no doubt would have no need to do anything for a defense legitimized by all rights and all the duties. Joseph Bonaparte and those around him asked for passports (1).

However, whatever the drawbacks of hostile determination, revolutionary passions prevailed. They were here, and the Directory ordered General Berthier, to whom in Bonaparte had given command with 30,000 men, to march on Rome (2). His instructions were:

Wouldn't one say, upon reading these instructions tions of the Directory or of Bonaparte, which Fanti and Cialdini, in the invasion of the Marches and Umbria, had to carry out Identical instructions?

In the letters written at that time in the name of the Directory, adds the historian Torian of Pius VI and Pius VII, the riot of December 26 was still referred to as the horrific event that took place in Rome on the 8th Nivôse. The Directory was well aware that by demanding reparations, he was merely following the initial successes of a conspiracy grante, of which he was the direct driving force (1).

But Berthier is on the move; he writes from Ancona: "I am at Ancona since yesterday, and I had a governor abducted during the night of the Pope and 200 men from his troops, who had had the audacity I decided to stay in Loreto. My vanguard will be in Macerata tomorrow. The rest will follow a day later.

This first dispatch was undoubtedly to follow the one in which Bona Parte had told him: "Do not allow a few scoundrels to French or Italians constitute themselves as patriots par excellence and "They are trying to impose their will on you."

The important thing was to remain in control of oneself. Two agents of the Directory, its ardent supporters on the day of 18 Fructidor, Communeau and Jorry had been sent by him to Rome; they acted were the brothers and friends (the rascals we just mentioned).

"The democrats," said Mr. Thiers, – (those he mentioned a page ago (previously few in number) –, with whom Berthier was in daily report by their club leader, meet at Campo Vaccino, where the remains of the ancient forum can be seen, and proclaim the Roman Republic. This theology touched "Few of our republican generals (1)." Berthier wrote to the general Bonaparte on 29 Pluviôse (February 17, 1798), a few days after his first dispatch, which we have just quoted:

"It is your victories, Citizen General, that have given the French army French means to march to Rome, to take revenge on his government the assassination of the brave General Duphot; the French army has mounted entrance, and Rome is free.

"On the 27th, the assembled people of this immense capital declared their in dependency and has regained its rights. The French government had written to his general some time before: You will to totter the tiara of the self-proclaimed head of the universal Church, all by assuring, then as ever, that they only wanted his temporal, and that he would still be recognized as bishop of Rome (1).

The next day, February 20, at four o'clock in the morning, in the middle of a storm that made the night even darker, he was thrown in a car and driven to France to die there, and a thousand Government and Masonic voices proclaim the end of the papacy. Which does not prevent Thiers, the historian and apologist for the French revolution to assert that the pope was treated with the considerations due to his age.

THE NAPOLEONIC DICTATORSHIP

I. – The failure of the Revolution in 1799.

The Convention's regime with the Jacobin clubs deliberated ruling and governing over the entire territory, the cult of the goddess Reason, the festival of the Supreme Being, theophilanthropy, The guillotine and permanent confiscation were the ideal of secret societies.

Germany and Italy were free. Pius VII had succeeded Pius VI; he had regained, after a thousand difficulties, possession of the capital of the world Catholic. In France, public opinion repeatedly echoed the above with greater force, and the restoration of the legitimate king of was coming imminently (1).

The skilled members of the secret societies, seeing that they could not to oppose the course of events, employed all this skill in interfering with the monarchical restoration, so as to be able to to see a constitutional government imposed on Louis XVIII which rendered the power of royalty illusory and allowed them to con-

And Malouet discussed these revolutionary projects which consisted of to install in France either a foreign prince or a Bourbon outside the order of succession to the throne, that is to say the duke d'Orléans, The intrigues of the Revolution are old, as we can see. Sieyès, searching everywhere for a dictator, had briefly considered to entrust this role to a prince of the house of Brunswick (2), obviously on the support he would find in Freemasonry.

But the dictator was closer and within the ranks of these same Jacobins. Bonaparte, who had sent Augereau to the Directorate to act against the royalists and the elected representatives of the nation The coup of 18 Fructidor was already, in the eyes of the most perceptive, the future preservation of the Revolution. Talleyrand, the great architect secret societies, had long been attached to his fortune, and during the festival celebrated in his honor after the treaty of At Campo-Formio, he had addressed these significant words to him:

The evidence from Sle-Hélène shows that her beliefs did not extend beyond the vague deism or the pantheism of Freemasonry.

"That evening, after dinner, the conversation turned to religion," he said. Mr. de Las Cases. The emperor stayed there for a long time. I am going to transcribe here, carefully, the summary, as quite characteristic of a point which has undoubtedly often aroused the curiosity of many.

"The emperor, after a very quick and heated movement, said: Everything proclaims the existence of a God. That's undeniable! But all Our religions are obviously the children of men.

"Why did these religions denounce and fight each other?" Why had it been like that in all times, in all places? It is that men are still men. That's what the priests have Fraud and lies have always crept in everywhere.

"However," said the emperor, "as soon as I had power, I..." eager to restore religion. I used it as a basis and as a root; in my eyes, it was the foundation of good morals, of true principles, good morals.

"I am far from being an atheist, certainly; but I cannot believe everything" what I am taught despite my reason, under penalty of being false and hypocritical.

"Napoleon took Freemasonry under his protection; Joseph Napoleon" was Grand Master of the Order; Arch-Chancellor Cambacérès, Grand Master deputy; Joachim Murat, second deputy grand master; the empress Josephine, being in Strasbourg in 1805, presided over the celebration of the adoption of the lodge of the free knights of Paris. At the same time, Eugène de Bcauharnais was the venerable master of the Saint-Eugène lodge in Paris. He came since in Italy with the dignity of viceroy, the Grand Orient of Milan appointed him master and sovereign commander of the supreme council of thirty-second grade, that is to say, he was granted the highest honor that could be done to him according to the statutes of the order. influential by virtue of their official position, their talents, or their strength of influence. The personal services he rendered to many brothers, the brilliance which he spread throughout the lodges, by bringing them to their meetings, through his example and his solicitations, all the military illustrations, judicial and other factors contributed significantly to the merging of parties and to the consolidation of the imperial throne. In it, under his administration With their active and brilliant activity, the lodges multiplied endlessly; they They were made up of the elite of French society; they became a point of meeting place for supporters of the existing regime and for those of the regime of the past. It was during this period that the Order of the Temple, which was then active and had a superior influence over all Masonic lodges, took to Paris had a sort of official existence. In 1808 its members... they poured through the town in procession and in full costume and gathered they went to the church of St. Anthony, where the prayer was solemnly pronounced his funeral procession for Jacques Molay. Such a demonstration was not possible only with the approval of Napoleon I, who had made himself an affiliate, it is said, to the order (2),

Mr. de Maistre reported a similar event shortly afterwards:

"A very remarkable phenomenon is that of the resurrection of the Freemasonry in France, to the point that a brother has just been buried solemnly in Paris with the attributes and ceremonies of the order. The master who reigns in France not only gives cause to suspect that Nothing of the sort can be done without his leave; judge by his character known for his ideas on secret societies. How then to explain What is the matter? Is he the leader or the dupe (one can be both) of a society he thinks he knows but which is mocking him (3)?

The marvelous genius of Joseph de Maistre thus illuminated with a ray of light on the delicate problem of Napoleon's relationships with Freemasonry.

Leader and instrument, that's what he was to the societies secret societies, and the secret societies were bound to break it eventually, the day where it would no longer be a docile instrument.

That's pretty much the same thing Bazot, the secretary of the Grand Orient, which, writing at a time very close to the bishpments, has a very particular authority;

"The imperial government," said F. Bazot, "made use of its omnipotence, to which so many institutions, so many men yielded so readily playfully, to dominate Freemasonry. She was neither frightened nor revolted. What did she desire, in fact? To expand her empire.

"She allowed herself to be subjected to despotism in order to become a sovereign raine. » (Code of Freemasons, p. 483.)

Omnia serviliter pro dominatione, as Tacitus said!

Napoleon PT, an instrument of Freemasonry, there are two words that singularly clash with the legend that many credulous Catholics have formed their own opinions about his role as a restorer of religion and tamer of the Revolution.

However, a careful examination of the facts is enough to destroy it.

In 1799, secret societies were under the threat of restoration Louis XVIII's return, returning to the country not in the middle of a national and embarrassing cataclysm, as it was in 1814, by foreign intervention, but by virtue of an exclusive movement national movement. By proclaiming Protestantism, what would I have achieved? I would have created... France has two major parties that are roughly equal, when I wanted there to be none. I would have had none of it at all; I would have brought back the fury of religious quarrels when the lights of the century and my will aimed to make them disappear completely. These two parties, by tearing each other apart, would have annihilated France, and would have made her a slave of Europe, when I had the ambition to make her the mistress of it.

Charles V, His rival, vehemently sided with Rome; for he believed he saw there For him, it was yet another way to achieve the subjugation of Europe. This Was this alone not enough to indicate to Francis I the necessity of tasked with defending the independence of that same Europe?

Unfortunately, Francis I understood nothing of it. That's because he couldn't offer scruples as an excuse. Quite simply. It's because he couldn't see that far ahead: a relic of the time! Feudal intelligence! Francis I, after all, was just a tournament hero, a handsome man "6alon, a do these great pygmy men (1)!"

But this is quite enough to elucidate the Napoleonic idea; it is without ambiguously, however impious it may appear. Or go and see the cults restored, with a principle that would have been, whatever anyone said contemporary adulation, which would be, whatever the naive person may think Catholic-liberal order, the inevitable and radical destruction of Catholicism licism in France, if the merciful power of God which often transforms obstacles into opportunities, if the enlightened zeal of the passages faithful supporters, if the faith of the French nation, whatever one might already have made to wrest it from him, had they not partially paralyzed the disasters very serious consequences.

This principle, one of the foundations of the Napoleonic ideal, which this emerges from all of Bonaparte's conversations on Saint Helena, of all his laws, of all his speeches, of all his actions, of all his life, this principle adopted by all of so-called Freemasonry preserved a trice to more effectively destroy all religions, that is the state or the protecting, master and or governments SUPREME ORGANIZERS OF ALL RELIGIOUS HOUSEHOLDS; it is the State, UNDER the absurd name of equal liberty, equal protection, dominating all the cults, administering them, making them civil servants, manipulating them, the oppressing all, like machines for grinding and enslaving all consciences. that, but also that of all secret societies, and everywhere adopted as the primary basis for their revolutionary operations against God, his Christ and his Church.

This is demonstrated by these testimonies from Bonaparte himself. that, in his mind, the concordat had never been a work in favor of religion, but for himself it was a matter of calculation and ambition, and as a mason, in agreement with his close friends Freemasonry, a more effective means, to destroy the Catholicism, that the civil constitution of the Constituent Assembly and the persecution bloody execution of the Convention.

The way in which the negotiations for the concordat were conducted leaves no doubt as to Napoleon's objective. the first proposals he made to Monsignor Spina, representing receiving the Pope in Paris, by Abbot Bernier, to whom services were rendered Cents in Vendée were worth the favor of the master(1), and could be summarized as follows:

"Resignation imposed on all former titular bishops; new diocesan district; sixty seats instead of 158; composition of a New clergy, a group of ecclesiastics from all parties; appointment of this clergy by the first consul, institution by the pope; promise of support mission to the established government ; salary from the state budget; renunciation donation to Church property, and full acknowledgment of the sale of these property; religious affairs policing referred to the civil authority, represented by the Council of State; finally, the Church's pardon to married priests, and their re-union with the Catholic faith."

These proposals were unacceptable, said Cardinal Consalvi in his memoirs.

The main difficulties revolved around freedom and publicity. of the Catholic faith, which Bonaparte wanted to be the master of to control or enslave, under the pretext of policing. Pius VII could not nor resolve to depose the faithful and banished bishops or persecuted for this very loyalty, which was imperatively demanded the self-proclaimed restorer of religion in France.

This policing of religious affairs, transferred to the State, was the essential point tial for Bonaparte, and it was to him that he always returned in all the twists and turns of these negotiations, which the memoirs of These were fabrications worthy of a forger. This was the culmination of it.

The terms of the concordat had been definitively agreed upon in between the plenipotentiaries and the day chosen for the examination of the subscribers tions; in the morning of that day, Napoleon had it announced, in The Monitor, the signing of the concordat by this note: "The car - Dinal Consalvi succeeded in "L'objet qui Va," which brought him to Paris. Gathered at the home of Joseph Bonaparte, brother of the First Consul, the abbot Bernier offered Consalvi the copy he had made from his scroll as if to get him to sign it without examination, but the latter Having glanced around to ascertain its accuracy, "I noticed "We must," he said, "that the concordat was not the one whose..." When questioned by Consalvi, Bernier confessed that he had committed this A deception on the express orders of Napoleon. One must read in the The Cardinal's Memoirs recount the scene of violence to which the first consul surrendered upon seeing his forgery discovered and the in The cardinal's shaky firmness.

"New negotiations are resuming, however, and especially on the police word j, which, as the commissioners of the first consul said, I didn't understand the true meaning. Finally, we settled on the following wording: "The Catholic religion lique, apostolic, roman, will be freely exercised in France; his worship will be public, in accordance with police regulations that the government will deem necessary for public peace republic.

The next day, after a night of anxiety, Cardinal Consalvi learned from Joseph that the first consul, very angry first of the amended article, had finally accepted it, after a long meditation and a long silence. 11 had seen that the word tranquil public opinion, interpreted in its own way, offered him a sufficient basis health for ORGANIC ARTICLES.

Organic articles were indeed the means by which Na* Poleon returned to the concession that the discovery of his forgery and The pressure from Catholic opinion in France had forced him to TO DO.

After the signing of the concordat, he had pressed for the departure and the Cardinal Consalvi's journey, to the point of not letting him take taking a day of rest necessary for one's health, in order to obtain rather the ratification of the concordat by the Holy Father. that they came to his attention; the bishops never recognized; public morals opposed their application on more than one point. But the State, under various governments who, through six revolutions, have succeeded one another since, never explicitly abandoned; from time to time, in the bad days, he uses it as a threat, and if God ever allows it that the country's vital forces are sufficiently weakened to allow giving free rein to the designs of a persecutory government, he will find all the avenues prepared in the legislation that the alleged res the architect of religion in France inaugurated it on the very day he promulgated the concordat.

Napoleon, moreover, was to launch a new assault on the power spiritual of the Pope and seek to withdraw the Concordat of 1801. But first, the modern Charlemagne had to destroy temporal power.

We will not recount here, after so many writers, the history of this a series of deceit and violence which culminated, in 1809, in the occupation of Rome and the captivity of the gentle and holy Pius VII. The Liberal writers, who have recounted this history, have condemned it with an indelible way the plunderer and the executioner (1).

But what cannot be emphasized enough is that Napoleon was less interested in seizing a few provinces, on which he had already been extending his domination for several years, than to put the pope under his control and make himself a docile instrument of this spiritual power whose understanding he grasped force without acknowledging its divine nature.

He himself revealed his thoughts by recounting them in his conversations with Ste-Hélène the goal he was pursuing when he extorted the Concordat of Fontainebleau to the imprisoned pope, separated from all his advisors and weakened by illness:

"I had other ideas. This move only increased the resistance feelings and intrigues. Until then the quarrel had only been temporary. The most enlightened men, Chaptal, Minister of the Interior,

THE NAPOLEONIC DICTATORSHIP

Mr. de Champagny pointed out the dangers of atheism and of the demoralization of the colleges that the Directory had bequeathed to new regime, and proposed the reconstitution of the Oratory which offered a union of enlightenment, patriotism, and tolerance, and on the second level of the congregations of the Doctrine and the Beneficent dictins of St-Maur.

"The fundamental flaw of the current regime," said Mr. de Champagny, "is that..." We have done nothing for education. We have done almost nothing for the survival vigilance, neither especially for the choice of leaders, nor in the regulations, nor in the given direction. It can be stated without exaggeration that a strong half of the leaders or professors are, from a moral point of view, in the more complete indifference, and that a quarter, speaking their words, their con* duite, their reputation, displays the most dangerous character under the eyes of youth.

"In vain will a headmaster, a censor, believe they have preserved the They keep secrets from their friends; there are no such secrets in a high school.

"Firm religious beliefs are the only sure guarantee" of the morality of men. In a nation and under a government who professes Christianity, there is no education if one does not train Christian students.

"It's not just by assigning a chaplain to a high school that..." Mass is said on Sunday, and we will reach our goal. Religion must be deeply engraved in the hearts and minds of the students. It does not It never will be, if the high school does not have a religious spirit, if the leaders do warmth and zeal. Yet only two or three high schools offer this spec tackle. Hence this estrangement from parents, which is attributed to prejudices political geese; hence the scarcity of fee-paying boarding schools; hence the discretion said of the high schools, and this constrained and uncertain situation that they present "Tent. Public opinion is unanimous on this point." He added: "A Wouldn't a single teaching body one day acquire moral power? and political influence in Velat, which would make him almost master of public opinion, do "Nator of all families?"

In vain did Portalis advocate for the father's rights and oppose of the exclusive power of the State, and of a system that would not tend to nothing less than destroying sacred rights on such a delicate matter of fatherhood.

Philosophers would see in his project only a return to a space of monasticism, and that although the congregations of the Oratory, the Doctrine and Saint-Maur had less than any other religious establishment has a particular spirit, however they

They also lacked that national spirit, that independence of opinions which characterize the teachers of a large society;... that new men were needed...

The mason Fontanes, the future grand master, questioned at his in response to Mr. de Champagny's note:

France needs, for a time at least, "of a single university, and a university with a single leader."

"That's it," replied the dictator, "you understand me (1)."

And the mason Fourcroy, director, since the last law, of public education, brought to the Legislative Body on May 6, 1806, a bill drafted as follows:

Article 1. A [name of university] shall be formed under the name of the Imperial University body exclusively responsible for teaching and education tion publics throughout the empire.

VI. – The Revolution on horseback and its accomplices in Europe

What Napoleon was doing in France to support the Revolution he did it throughout Europe, everywhere his weapons were spreading out.

Overthrow of national dynasties, equality of cults, ex-religious impulse, sale of church property, sharing forced inheritances, abolition of workers' guilds, destruction of the provinces and local liberties: that's what he did—even in the countries that he directly annexed to the empire, or this that he had done by the vassal kingdoms created in Spain, to Naples, in Italy, in Holland, in Westphalia, in Poland. It is also the work accomplished by the German princes who, like the Elector of Mainz, the Archbishop of Alberg, a fanatic, him were selling the honor and liberty of their country. In 1809, he... was fulfilling his task by destroying the temporal power of the Pope and by seeking to reduce the Catholic Church everywhere to a miserable state of a Russian Church, this dream still pursued by the skilled Secret societies. Once engaged in the struggle with the sovereign As pontiff, he waged war in France against the clergy and the Catholic faithful. questions to an odious persecution that a liberal writer, Mr. d'Haus-Sonville, in his fine book, stigmatized the Roman Catholic Church and the First Empire (1).

This is certainly a formal accusation of treason, which a high-ranking Freemason, Carbonaro of the 7th and final degree, lance against brothers. After that, it might be easy to explain, in the history of France and Germany, events which were an unsolvable enigma for contemporaries.

In the Memoirs and Political Correspondence of Joseph de Maistre, there is a letter, about the Battle of Austerlitz, which I do not then not to give an excerpt here:

Your Majesty will not learn of this without extreme indignation. that at a distance of four or five leagues from the battlefield one has found abundant provisions for the entire retreating army.

One of the means used to facilitate the march of the armies Imperialism had been the creation of military lodges:

"The imperial government had encouraged the formation of lodges" military, said Clavel, and there were few regiments to which there were not attached a Masonic lodge. When the French troops took possession of a city, their lodges chose a location there, and applied were tasked with providing initiation to those inhabitants who appeared to be exercising to have the most influence on the population. These, in turn, opened up lodges, and had them established by the Grand Orient of France. When that afterwards these lodges became quite numerous, they formed a National Grand Orient, which affiliated with that of Paris and received from He was the driving force. This is how the Grand Orient was established in 1806. from Baden to Mannheim and, in 1811, the Grand Orient of Westphalia in Kassel.

In 1845 the Masonic journal L'Orient, criticizing the tide Chal Soult, having banned regimental lodges, wrote:

I. – THE TUGENDBUND AND THE HOLY ALLIANCE

To fully appreciate the role of secret societies in moment of recovery of the Restoration and the congress of Vienna, we need to go back a little.

The crimes of the Revolution had caused [scars] throughout Europe a profound sense of horror among a large number of honest people clear people, who had allowed themselves to be drawn in by new ideas and were part of Masonic lodges.

We know the effects this sentiment has had in England and the all-out struggle against the Revolution that Pitt and Burke inaugurated. Impiety and anti-Christianity, which had had their From their starting point, they quickly lost all their credibility. to be masons and who are distinguished from others only by ties which seem to overturn those of benevolence and fraternal charity. The government and all of Christianity would have been lost since for a long time in England, if one could suppose the Freemasons initiated into the sect's latest mysteries. It has been a long time since the There are enough lodges there to have fulfilled a similar project and if, with the means of the backroom masons, the English had adopted the plans and the plots. In the time when the enlightened ones of Germany

Philo's letters to Spartacus represent the followers of London arriving in Germany covered and adorned with cords, jewelry of all grades, but not, in essence, either against the people, whether on religion, none of these projects, these mysteries that tend directly to the goal (1). »

However, as Robison points out, a number of illustrations The mined mingled with the lodges, and public distrust was such after the publication of his book and Barruel's book which, from From 1799 onwards, the lodges almost ceased to meet in England. land. A parliamentary act of July 12, 1799, prohibited the erection new lodges and did not allow those that existed to continue to disguise their existence only on the condition of registering them at meetings and the appointment of its members. It was only around 1805 that Freemasonry was revived (2), and in 1811 that it gave itself a new constitution.

Under the influence of such a powerful opposing current of thought, the most skilled men in the secret societies understood that it was necessary to postpone their plans and stick for the moment to preventing the reaction of the spirits to go so far as to restore the old Christian social order. This new tactic resulted in the foundation of the Tugendbund in Germany. From 1806, closely linked to Freemasonry, which provided it with the means to propagate, the new association differentiated itself from it by renouncing the attacks against Christianity, which filled the lodges. She wanted to create a religious union of Germany on a humanitarian basis; silence; philosophy, philology, and the science of

CONSTITUTIONAL

Once we know the policy adopted by the companies secrets in the upper echelons of European politics, we understands how they seemed to rally to the restoration of the Bourbons in France. They forced them to adopt the constitutional regime. The charter was issued by Alexander of Russia. This prince was subject to himself the impetus of Talleyrand and Dalberg, who since a few years later they had distanced themselves from Napoleon and had become to appoint members of the provisional government at the appropriate time.

These two figures, enlightened masters, surrounded him from his arrival in Paris, through these influences which have just to speak of Maistre and who, during this stay, were all-powerful about him (2). De Maistre constantly points out during these years the power of the sect "which is both one and many" and its strange alliances. Freemasonry in this evolution knew Subsequent events have partly confirmed these indications. The consorts were driven from power in Italy and replaced by much more advanced men. But Austria has not yet been attacked. Mr. Bismarck has shown himself to be a titubant, and the sects have partially withdrawn their trust in him or at least threaten it. (Book II, Chapter XI, Scenes 5 and 7.

The Haute-Vente, composed of a few great lords broken and Jewish, was the continuation of the internal order of which we have seen the constitution before the Revolution of 1789 (book II, ch. V, § 2). All of them had France as their base of operations. Freemasonry. Certainly, not all Freemasons were Carbonari, but they nonetheless contributed to the same goal, because 1° the lodges, through an initial initiation, prepared the person nel where they were recruited; thus, according to the constitution of the Car-Bonara, the Italian Freemasons, when they asked to be initiates were exempt from the first apprentice grade (1); 2° they facilitated the procedures of their members; and finally, by the direction given to the great herd of regimented fools in The lodges, they formed that irresistible weight of public opinion. that where did the elections that cornered the monarchy come from a charter, in a deadlock to which a coup d'état offered only one way out.

After the success, Freemasonry boasted greatly of the support she had given to the Carbonari.

"The lodges had been, says Le Siècle, the cradle and the nursery" of the famous Carbonari society, which endangered the Restoration and contributed so greatly to the renaissance "The establishment of the Republican party in France."

This testimony is confirmed by that of Louis Blanc in Y, a ten-year story.

In Italy, the current Grand Master of Neapolitan Freemasonry, Domnico Anghera, in a Secret History of the Order, printed born in 1864, reports with satisfaction that the work of the Carbonari or buoni cugini, in 1820-1821, was directed by the ma- lodges conical and led by their followers, who took other designations. "The distinctive feature of the Grand Firmment was a continuous trend to gain control over other societies, while maintaining appearances, and to make them serve, without appearing to do so, in the execution of his plans.

"Everything was prepared to merge together Alta Vendita and the Grand-Firmament (Grand Orient). The two deputies in charge of this operation were the Sicilian Duke of Garatula and the Neapolitan Carlo Chiricone Klerckon, son of Duke Framarino, prefect of the king's palace. The latter Its responsibilities included Germany, Switzerland, and France. Arrived In Geneva, where I had come from France, he brought me letters from one of my close friends, who had been an agent in Naples for the disaffected Polish... Klerckon informed me of the purpose of his mission; he urged me urgently how to accept the position of Inspector General of the Carbonari in Switzerland, from Germany, and issued me the patent which he had brought from Naples... Whatever the circumstances, it is therefore undeniable that Carbonarism was grafted onto Freemasonry and that it returned in France in 1821. The accounts of Messrs. Louis Blanc and Vaulabelle, whom we will return to, reconcile themselves with that de Wit, without actually saying the same thing:

"Wonderfully suited to the Italian character, but not very clean" to become in France a code for the use of conspirators, – (because of (some necessary Christian appearances in Italy), – one had to consider to amend these statutes, and Messrs. Bûchez, Bazard and Flottard, members from the administrative committee of the Masonic lodge of the Friends of Truth, were chosen to lay the foundations for a more scholarly organization, – (that is to say, without any trace of Christianity, the spirit and the goal remaining the same) (even, as we will soon see) –.

"The association's prevailing ideology was not precise, but the considerations amounted to decreeing national sovereignty without to define it, according to the spirit of Italian Carbonarism. But more the formula was vague, the better it responded to the diversity of resentments and hatreds. So they were going to conspire on an immense scale with an immense ardor and this without any idea of the future, without prior studies, at will of all capricious passions.

Another Freemason historian, M. de Vaulabelle, gives of On his side, the following details:

On one side were the conservative Freemasons, who pursued especially the subjugation of the Church and wanted to moderate the march the Revolution's cause for their benefit, to fix it in governments constitutional: that was the policy of Haute-Vente, of the re-aristocratic revolutionaries who had led the movement of 1815 and the uprisings of 1821. On the other side were the men new ones who, beyond the destruction of the Church, wanted to achieve de facto equality and prepare the way for socialism through universal republic.

Amidst these failures and hesitations, Mazzini gained the terrain and arrived, through his activity and his audacity which did not stopped at nothing to create a kind of supreme direction over all that was youngest and of more democratic in the lodges, sales, and clandestine clubs

Diplomacy will soon be forced to reckon with him. One of his accomplices, jealous above all of his fortune, wrote to the secretariat of the Roman state on June 17, 1845:

"Mazzini found people in England who would not be far from advancing money for an expedition to Italy, if one could give them certain proof that for this expedition one has resolute men in large numbers, and if a plan were presented to them which had a plausible chance of success. As a consequence of this, we have written in Ardoïno in Spain and in Morandi of Modena, currently in Greece, both enterprising and bold men, the latter on everything that is linked to all the Greek revolutionaries and has done for a long time the pirate's trade. Ardoïno, a Piedmontese, a very good officer, enjoys a very great authority over all Italian refugees in Spain and has extensive relations with the Spanish ultra-revolutionary party.

And Mazzini himself wrote in a letter to one of his relatives:

But here we must interrupt the account of the attacks against the papauté to recount the great European upheaval that began Paris during the February Days of 1848.

V. – The Revolution of 1848

As we have said, dynastic concerns had ended up absorbing all the activity of the government of July. All the support he had given to the Cosmopolitan Revolution Lite had limited herself to the memorandum, the occupation of Ancona, and to the establishment of governments similar to itself in Espagne and in Portugal (2). Ruled sovereignly from 1840, by Guizot (3), the constitutional monarchy entered more and more

A large Masonic convention was held in 1847.

Several Masonic convents had preceded him in Rochefort, in Heidelberg, where the deputies were appointed. It met in Strasbourg, a town so dear to the lodges, and so well suited to gathering emissaries from France, Germany, and Switzerland. "We will mention," Eckert said, the names of the most prominent figures who were there took part. These names were communicated to us from Berlin by the most reliable source, and, if necessary, we will produce the entire list. Freemasonry was quick to applaud the revolution.

On March 10, 1848, the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite was going to congratulate to quote the provisional government, and Lamartine replied:

"I am convinced that it was from the depths of your lodges that these things emanated, first in the shadows, then in the twilight, and finally in full sunlight again, the feelings that ultimately led to the sublime explosion of which we we witnessed in 1789, and of which the people of Paris have just given the second and, I hope, last performance in the world, not long ago of days.

In turn, on March 24, a delegation from the Grand Orient, having at its head was F.*. VI. – The first assault on temporal power

POPES

A man of faith, prayer, work, virtue, and science, of ineffable kindness, of candor and of true affability celestial and which depicted itself in all its features, Pius IX joined to an uprightness and a charity that does not suspect evil, like speaks the apostle, a firmness of soul and conscience that nothing is capable of deviating from the path of known duty. With also possessing eminent qualities, he, as pontiff-king, could only think of doing the good of his states and to bring back through truly Christian liberty

Nothing was wiser than such an ordination; in the midst of the ruins of thrones crumbling on all sides under the blows of the so-secret societies, she maintained the true idea of the monarchy paternal, and safeguarding the independence of spiritual power, Also monarchical, it linked the new era to the ancient citizens and reconciled both powers with all the interests of peoples and with all true freedoms. Thus it was received with a general recognition, and the advisors she had just received were they brought back in triumph to recreate, in the magnificent carriages provided by the nobility, from the papal audience to the church St. Peter's and the hall of their sessions in the Vatican.

From then on, the popular demonstrations that it is unnecessary to describe one by one; because They were too alike. But, alas, those days were destined to be short; and already the serpent of secret societies was hidden beneath "These flowers," adds the Polish historian whose account we are analyzing. The popular demonstrations at the Quirinal Palace not only supported the momentum of national and Catholic recognition, they removed also the work of a shadowy conspiracy that wanted to lull the Italian princes especially through the incense of flattery, and to obtain to make every possible concession to them, in order to make concessions against them same and against their own people destructive weapons. The impressionable and frivolous crowd then repeated these praises, com She has repeated the most vile calumnies ever since.

Soon it became apparent that the gangs that were gathering at the Quirinal Palace, the feeling of gratitude no longer followed and of devotion to the Holy See; but that they obeyed a secret impulse, that they had a clandestine organization and recognized leaders. It was therefore easy to predict that the acclamations The cheers and applause would soon turn into demands and in tumultuous shouts. It was, moreover, for the artillery without and the day laborers in good faith a waste of time and an interruption of work which could only encourage idleness and The far-niente, so natural to the peoples of hot countries. Also the Did the Holy Father issue a motu proprio to encourage the people to cease these gatherings, to return to the economy and to work; and he or given that the money collected for such festivals was spent for the benefit of the poor.

But Mazzini's agents were already everywhere, and it was he who, in his last manifesto to the friends of Italy, November 1846,

"Take advantage," he told them, "of every concession to bring the masses, if only to show their gratitude. Celebrations, songs, gatherings, numerous relationships established between Men of all opinions are enough to spark ideas, therefore to give the people a sense of their strength and make them demanding. The difficulty It's not about convincing the people: a few big words, freedom, rights of man, progress, equality, fraternity, despotism, privileges, tyrant Denial, slavery, are sufficient for that; the difficult part is bringing them together. The "The day he is reunited will be the day of the new era..."

Now, there was then in Rome a common man who had for His real name was Angelo Bruncetti, and his nickname was Cicervacchio. reverted to the constitution of Pius X, modifying it in such a way so that the necessary guarantees for spiritual administration are due pontificate were very well defined and reserved, as if the expé nothing we had just obtained was not more than sufficient for men of good faith. It had been decided first, under pre-text of a more complete freedom, than any representative of the head of The Church would not be invited or admitted to the conferences. It was by anticipating the treaty between France and Piedmont settling the question Roman tradition without Rome and the Pope.

It was soon judged, however, that such an affront could not to be done in the presence of the Sacred College and the Pope, under their very eyes, and Pius IX having been asked to kindly choose his representative, he designated Cardinal Anlonelli, who was appointed president by the con reference itself.

The principle of intervention was no more disregarded than the law of the sovereign pontiff. Rome could obviously not be left under the yoke of a factious minority and a kind of assembly a constituent assembly that legislatively obeys a handful of wretches. But the principle is acclaimed, how can it be applied without harm? to be aware of some national sensitivities. It was difficult to to come to an agreement, when the Holy See itself proposed a plan which seemed to satisfy everyone, by making each of the powers, its most appropriate share of intervention. France was to occupy Civita-Veccchia, the province of Spolète and Perugia; Austria, the Legations as far as Ancona; the Neapolitan army, the province of Velletri, Frosinone and Ascoli on its borders; then Spain, Rome and its surroundings.

It was Spain that first gave the idea of the con-reference; it was she again who, in her note of December 21st, had proposed to France a congress to restore sovereign independence the Pope's dependence guaranteed by the Catholic powers, in order to that a small country should not decide a question that concerns the whole of the Christendom, and that an Italian city should not insult with impunity he who is venerated by the entire Catholic world, and did not give him not in her spiritual government a dependency of which she

In any case, they refused to receive and recognize the governor whom Pius IX sent to take in his name the command of Civita-Veccchia, and the flag of the republic The Roman statue was kept next to the French flag.

However, the Neapolitan troops had taken up positions on the border; and the Austrian troops were advancing on their side, while a powerful reaction was being prepared in Rome. A circle the municipal appeal addressed to the civic guard found many supporters rents, Lubinski wrote; at the Transtevero two-thirds of the guard civic-minded people were for the Pope. The Papal reaction counted in Its ranks included a multitude of wealthy citizens and commoners; it had at its disposal at Home, a number of 35,000 men; a much larger number

A large number of auxiliaries supported him in the campaigns, led by a Roman prince. This reaction of loyalty wanted to imprison to overthrow the triumvirs, dissolve the national assembly, seize the Castel Sant'Angelo and the city gates, open them to the French That's it, disarm the worst part of the civic guard and all the volunteers.

But an ambiguous proclamation to the Romans, sent, it is said,

Lombard volunteers whom the French had not wanted to do prisoners when they arrived in Civitavecchia, their arrival in Rome with Garibaldi, the arrest of several reactionary leaders, the assassination by dagger of a battalion commander, the civic duty, honest citizens held back by fear of the ban, cosmopolitan sayings that were constantly increasing, the muffled noise that the French Republic did not want to destroy the Roman Republic. Maine, everything contributed to paralyzing the plans of the reaction, and when Oudinot, counting on her, according to the reports of the duke d'Harcourt, who was urging him to come to Rome to give him the hand, presented himself confidently beneath the walls of Rome and to Saint-Pancrace gates, Light Horse gates, Angelica and Cavaligieri, he was everywhere met with gunfire and cannon fire, without surrender. He did not counter any sign of help from the Roman conservatives. The Commander Picard was even greeted with 250 men at the gate Saint Pancrace, to the cry of "Long live peace! Long live the French!", did not... He refused that to become a prisoner with his men and suffer all the types of insults and mistreatment.

Meanwhile, an envoy, a former consul in Barcelona, representative of the Bonapartes, arrives from France to negotiate with the triumvirate for the peaceful entry, if possible, of the French troops into Rome. His name was Ferdinand de Lesseps (1). First he was rather poorly received, judging by his letter of May 24th to the assembly. Where he complained of having been threatened with a dagger, he soon entered into intimate relations with the triumvirs and eventually agreed (I transcribe Lubinski) that the French army would not penetrate into Rome, that it would only have external barracks, at 15 or 20 kilometers from Rome, and that it would limit itself to defending

This convention, if the convening of the triumvirs and of Lesseps was, whatever the motives, a betrayal on his part (or on the part of those who had sent him). General Oudinot rejected this act with indignation, as well as the other generals, unable to forgive Lesseps for having wasted so much time on such negotiations, while the approaching summer heat exposed the army to the ravages of

The Moniteur of August 23, 1849 reported the alleged treaty and the censure by the council of Elat, as well as the conduct of The envoy. It reads:

"Delicate issues were involved in this mission. On the one hand the government had not recognized the Roman Republic; the The papal nuncio had remained in Paris with his official status; the envoys of the triumvirs had not been received. The government did not see in the powers that dominated Rome than de facto powers, with which necessity perhaps compelled us to deal with, but which were de- endowed with all legal character; in his eyes the Roman republic was the product of violence and surprise. These were, as you can see, double-entry instructions, but leaning more strongly towards the party opposed to the sovereign pontiff. This secretive conduct is indicated by the initial steps of L. Bonaparte, deputy. It became more pronounced when he reached to the presidency, and left no doubt during his dictatorship. France's eminently Catholic character and the need to learn Puyet, on him, was the only obstacle at that time to the achievement of his plans for the complete ruin of the papal government. "The lieutenant colonel, after reading me the knife of this letter, asked me to make it known to the army and the population, and to allow its integration in Home's newspaper. I felt I had to refuse, to resist his entreaties and those which have been done since: I have the honor to submit to you the reasons for my refusal.

"Nothing in the government dispatches informed me of the existence According to the letter from the President of the Republic, she should only have had in her the authority of a particular letter. When its publication was demanded, I had to investigate whether it was appropriate to allow it. As a result of the continuation of The state of siege in Rome, the position of the commander-in-chief had acquired an importance no political action could be taken: no notification through the press could take place without special authorization. The appearance of a printed document, whatever that it may be, implicitly carries his approval, and its meaning becomes that of an official act: it did not seem to me that the instructions of the chaplain were... to give such importance to the letter from the President of the Republic.

"I could have assumed responsibility for the order that accompanied the letter of Mr. Lidgard Ney, if the state of mind in the capital and the imminence of events The comments had not made its publication dangerous for the army and the government. that we had just restored.

"For some time now, police reports have informed me that a A society, called the Fraternité, had formed in Rome, with the aim of working on the minds of the army, to harm the officers and non-commissioned officers, to provoke demonstrations political actions against the national government, in which they allegedly participated the French army soldiers. I therefore had reason to fear that Mon's letter Mr. President of the Republic, by exciting the spirit of the members of the Fraternity, by showing our officers, our soldiers, the approach there is a disconnect between the thinking of the head of state and the projects of society. I saw immediately the retirement of the cardinals, that of the officials newly organized administrations.

"For these reasons, I formally refused to participate in the application process for the publication of the new policy outlined to me by the letter to Mr. Edgard Ney and that from the President of the Republic addressed to me. of Europe.

But to better understand the entire European Masonic plan Pean, and to have the key to all these equivocal hypocrites and all the events that we are about to see unfold, we must reveal Here is the program drawn up a few months earlier by the Grand-Orient of Orients, Lord Palmerston, and which he had published at this era in a newspaper placed under his direction by wrapping it of more or less fanciful historical and diplomatic considerations taciturn.

The letter to Edgard Ney is dated August 18, 1849, and the program • published in the very newspaper of Freemasonry, the Globe, is from May 12, 1849. Here is the program:

"It is to be feared that the events of the previous year (1848) had only been the first scene of a drama with more fruitful results broad and less peaceful. The scaffolding erected by the Congress of Vienna was so arbitrary and so artificial that all statesmen with opinions The liberals could see that he would not withstand the first shock of Europe (1).

"The entire system established by Congress was in complete dissolution, and Lord Palmerston acted wisely when he refused to lend his condolences. courses to oppose a dike to the invading waves.

"The plan he has formed is that of a new configuration of Europe, the establishment of a vigorous German kingdom, which could be

(t) Most of the statesmen who had erected this scaffolding were in favour of so many high-ranking Freemasons, and that is why the vast Catholic provinces had been annexed to Protestant or schismatic states: Poland to Russia, the the Rhine provinces to Prussia, Porrentruy to Bern, Ghablais to Geneva, the Belgium and Holland. But that wasn't enough. Italy had remained Catholic. and the papacy, although not without effort, had regained the integrity of its states.

Palmerston has often been criticized for having neglected Austria's alliance; but here his accusers will still have to answer to him to do justice. England's alliance with Austria has never based on a community of principles; it existed simply because that Austria was the main representation and as the embodiment of the German nation.

"From the Peace of Westphalia to that of Aix-la-Chapelle" (1648-1748), Austria found itself to be the center of German unity. But when Frederick's sword had pushed back the borders of his kingdom which was formerly the Electorate of Brandenburg; when the true allies The Prussians would have recognized in this warrior the true representative of their Because of their strength and nationality, Prussia became the ally on this continent natural of England. Only George's self-esteem and timidity The Third Estate obstructed the alliance between Prussia and England was our shield in the American war.

"What Austria was at the beginning of the last century, what Prussia later became, and Germany may be as well, that it had its capital in Berlin or Frankfurt. If Lord Palmerston succeeded in to consolidate this natural alliance and strengthen it through a cor- agreement In his dialogue with France, he will have proven to what extent he is truly the the most skillful diplomat that this era has seen (1). r

It should come as no surprise to see Lord Palmerston using a article in the newspaper to communicate his plans to the followers of secret societies; the method was habitual to him, as he had been told

The previous chapter concludes by showing the plan that Palmerston, who, according to Eckert and Misley, became the most not that of Mazzini, but rather that of the Roman High Vendée.

We were able to see how, after the abortion of the republic Universal in 1818, Mazzini had gradually lost ground.
He had to submit to Palmerston's plan, but not without protest, without rigorously monitoring its execution, and act

These predictions came true in every detail. Queen Christine went into voluntary exile, and the revolution did not take place (1). But soon Mr. Gladstone opened the debate against the Bourbons. Naples, and a little later, on January 1, 1859, Napoleon was to give the signal for all hands on deck with his famous apostrophe to Mr. de Hübner.

The heart of all this policy was Palmerston. He needed, to carry out its plans, of France, of its army, of its financiers these. In January 1852 he had the new empire recognized by the Anglo-England with an eagerness that won the gratitude of other European courts, which remained for some time in an expectant attitude.

The plan that Lord Palmerston was having drawn up in the Globe of May 12, 1849, and which included the unification of Germany under the Prussia, the creation of a Polish-Hungarian kingdom and that of a kingdom of northern Italy, under the house of Savoy (book II, Chapter 9, paragraph 7 in fine), had failed before the forces of Russia and the still vigorous monarchical resistance of Austria. To resume the work of the Masonic program, it was resolved to to turn all French and English forces against Russia, and to associate them with the Piedmontese forces, since ultimately Piedmont had such a large share in the program's profits. How else can we explain this interference by Piedmont against Russia, about which he had never had cause to complain, which had on the contrary, if effectively advised and protected under the first empire and at the Congress of Vienna? The plan having suddenly changed, Prince Napoleon withdrew and published in Paris in 1855 a pamphlet, from which we extract the following passages:

If the Pope, as king, had wanted it to do so much, perhaps the aura was assimilated to the Grand Turk; but Unable to bring it there, the Paris congress, after having thus, in the name of the Mahometan god, guaranteed all genres of independence and inviolability to Turkey, opened, against Rome and the papacy, the long series of protocols of all kinds that the Masonic diplomacy intends to conclude only through the destruction of the papacy itself.

On March 27th, said Mr. de Corcelles, Count Cavour, Grand Orient of Piedmont Masonic, assisted by Mr. de Villamarina had given a note to the ministers of France and England verbal demand in the government of the Holy See the intervention of the powers that will meet in congress.

The impotence of the sovereign pontiff to govern his people; permanent danger of disorder in central Italy; extension the extent of Austrian domination far beyond what the treaties of 1815 granted it to him; such a thesis removed the argument which was being made undermined by these words:

"If there is one fact that clearly emerges from the history of these last few years, it's the difficulty, or rather, the impossibility of a reform complete of the papal government, which responds to the needs of the time and to the reasonable wishes of the people.

"It is obvious," adds Count do Cavour, "that the court of Rome will fight until the very last moment against the execution of these two projects. It was made into a protocol that no longer only included the Pope and Naples, but Florence, Parma and Modena, by the words of the governments of the Italian peninsula, and it was the 22nd that was signed by everyone, just like the others.

From that moment on there could no longer be any doubt about the course of events. On April 11, 1856, Mr. de Bunsen, minister from Prussia to London, he wrote to Mr. Cobden: "May God follow Blessed be the return of peace! But everywhere we only look at it "like the end of the first Punic war, that is to say easy- "That. The theater of the second will be Italy. I am sure that" "Napoleon has already decided on it (2)."

The game was committed against all of Italy and especially against the papacy, in blatant disregard of all principles. One could see the great Italian kingdom was emerging in the House of Savoy; it was a new triumph for the Palmerston program, and a new beginning of victory for Freemasonry and the Carbonara. "You know that I have always refused to see only one thought" dynastic in the affection of Louis-Napoleon for his cousin. I'ai always thought that he was grateful to him for having kept Napoleon's name alive within the ranks of democracy, and having abstained from any alliance policy with the supporters of the past, arguing that he, on the contrary, was obliged to take everyone into account without distinction of party, according to the demands of the time and the necessities of his supreme position. Between us, I don't believe the emperor hates men who, in Italy, they fought against the abominations of the governments of Naples, of Rome and Milan.

Therefore, this other passage is not surprising.

What cannon does he need to make the Emperor of Austria tremble? in Italy, the King of Prussia on the Rhine, England in Ireland, and Even Russia in Poland and on the banks of the Danube? Since 1848, We know a great deal in all these countries about the strategy used for peoples, far more skillful and powerful than the strategy in use kings. — Between us, it seems to me that this is the real ambition and fundamental to the current Emperor Napoleon.

As we can see, Saint-Simonianism had a voice or an ear in the council And perhaps both of them. In any case, everything being ready, Napoleon III, in the first days of 1859, gave the sign the uproar announced in 1853, six years in advance, by H. British diplomacy, under the pretext of peace, had stopped the march of the Austrian army as much time as it takes needed the French army to reach Italy by sea and by land. Let's examine its effects.

A draft treaty completely freeing Italy and stripping it naming Austria, subject to certain compensations, of all its possessions in Italy, had been sent by Palmerston to Prussia, without revealing the author to him; Prussia had just returned him to send to the Emperor of Austria, when Napoleon III asked him after an interview in Villafranca, promising to treat him more favorably keys to promoting the formation of an Italian confederation, under the honorary presidency of the Pope. The Emperor of Austria was to, by the 3rd, as it was presented to him, cede his rights to Lombardy to the Emperor of the French who, according to the wishes of the people, would hand it over to the King of Sardinia. Austria added: "To the ex reception of the fortresses of Mantua and Peschiera, and a line of "Borders exactly defined," and had the following removed: "According to the wish populations. » Veneto, while remaining under the crown of The Emperor of Austria, according to the 4th article, was to be part of the Italian Confederation. The proposed 5th article was worded as follows: "Both sovereigns will make every effort, except for recourse" to arms, so that the Dukes of Tuscany and Modena may return in their states, by granting a general amnesty and a cons "titulation." He was reduced, without ambiguity or conditions, to these words: "The Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena return to their states by granting a general amnesty.

The 6th article was thus proposed: "The two sovereigns of will order the Holy Father to introduce reforms in his states necessary and to administratively separate the Legations from the rest of the Papal States." This was obviously the pro-vicariate posed by Cavourau at the Paris congress and which slipped in surreptitiously tically, and at the same time a beginning of secularization tion requested by the letter to Edgard Ney.

It was thus stipulated: "The two emperors will ask the the Holy Father to introduce in his States indispensable reforms bles. » The 7th and final article stipulated a full amnesty and entire to the people compromised during the recent events incidents in the territory of the belligerent parties.

The Treaty of Zurich, signed four months later, on November 10 1859, did not change the substance of these preliminaries; it stipulated only at greater length and in all the details the consequences these of the cession of Lombardy. Article 19 stated: "The circumstances territorial conscriptions of the independent states of Italy which had not gone into the last war, unable to be changed only with the cooperation of the powers that presided over their training and recognition of their existence, the rights of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, the Duke of Modena and the Duke of Parma, are expressed reserved between the high contracting powers." The 20^e expressed the union of efforts to obtain from His Holiness that the need to introduce into the administration of these States the reforms deemed essential must be undertaken by its government ment in serious consideration (1).

But by whom were these reforms to be recognized? conceivable? By the Pope or by the contracting emperors? In In both cases, was not such a stipulation without the pope and against the pope an intervention in the administration of its states? Piedmont, here again, only signed the treaty which... ceded Lombardy, as he has boasted so many times since, in order to shift the responsibility for all of this onto France that he was going to do against all these treaties and against the law of nations more indisputable.

Everything in this war and in this peace treaty was therefore the continuation of hostile thinking towards the Holy See and its power which we have found in all the previous acts of Louis-Napoleon. But let us follow the development of this to its conclusion. thought.

On May 3, 1859, in his proclamation dated from the Tuileries, he had declared to France and the world: that he would respect the territory and the rights of neutral powers. We are not going to In Italy, he said, neither foment disorder nor shake the power of the Holy Father, whom we have restored to his throne, but the under to respond to this foreign pressure that weighs heavily on the entire peninsula, contribute to establishing order there based on legitimate interests my satisfied customers.

Piedmont, under the pretext of popular wishes, annexed these provinces and almost simultaneously the states of the Dukes of Tos Cane, from Modena and Parma. Not only the head of the army French made no effort to oppose it, as he had just to engage in the preliminaries and the treaty; but three days after the signing of the preliminary agreement on July 14, as reported Mr. de Thouvenel's letter of February 12, 1860, to The French ambassador to the Holy See, he himself wrote from Desenzano to Pope Pius IX, as to Gregory XVI, of the ar- the insurgents' party, as in Edgard Ney, as in the proposal The position was rejected by Austria:

"In this new order of things, Your Holiness can exercise the most great influence and to put an end to any cause of unrest in the future. That she consents, or rather that she willingly agrees of her own volition The Legations had a separate administration with a secular government appointed by her, but surrounded by a council formed by the election; that this the province pays a fixed fee to the Holy See, and Your Holiness will ensured the peace of its states and could do without foreign troops. I beseech Your Holiness to listen to the voice of a son devoted to the Church, but who understands the needs of his time.

A few months later, on December 31st, leaving the tracks With vain hypocrisy, he wrote again to the Pope, announcing to him denouncing the definitively accomplished fact of violent annexation or by the force of the Romagnas in Piedmont, the letter which threw to the voy Piedmontese and Garibaldian racial identity throughout the states of the Holy See, and that Mr. de Cavour thus characterized in a speech of explanation- citation, in the Chamber of Deputies of Turin, on May 26, 1860:

"The peace of Villafranca had undoubtedly been painful; and if I withdrew from the management of affairs because expectations which had always guided my policy had not been fulfilled; but

The state is a beautiful thing, but as long as Venice remains in the hands of the Austrians, the Italian question cannot be considered resolved. However, the annexation of Romagna, it must be acknowledged, has, under another in this respect, of equal importance to that of Veneto.

He was the first to admit that, in order to love Romagna, Turin had to... sent millions; that afterwards the revolutionary junta obtained the guarantee due his loans; that in a certain circumstance the king gave his signature per Sonnello, but only bankers, who today present themselves as unitary liberals. did not loosen their purse strings to provide the guaranteed 400,000 francs by Her Majesty.

352 The destruction of the Pope's temporal power

"The letter from Napoleon III to the Pope dated December 30, 1859, proclaiming that the Pope's reign in Romagna is over, is a date memorable in the history of Italy. By this letter the emperor, to my in this sense, has earned our gratitude a title that does not yield to that which he had conquered by defeating the Austrians on the heights of Solferino. Indeed, this is so, because by means of this letter he put an end to priestly domination, which was more detrimental to us. perhaps even Austrian domination.

"I was criticized for giving too much importance to the letter of the emperor to the pope. But this is not a simple letter, it is the confirmation of a great principle. In this letter, the sovereign of a The Catholic nation declares that the temporal power of the Pope is not not sacred; now, such a fact is, for the Italian question, just as important as long as the Battle of Solferino.

"The question of the Pope's temporal power is not only a an Italian question, but a European question, a United question Verselle, and I am not aware that, without this declaration, any minister would have dared to assume responsibility for the annexation of Romagna. This letter This event is of equal importance to us as the liberation of Venice. Thus, it should not be said that the cession of Savoy and Nice was for us without compensation... (1). »

And with 92 votes against 10, they accepted, convinced by this speech. the cession of Savoy and Nice, demonstrated to Italy, to the France and the world that this transfer was the price and the consent the French government's response to the annexation of Romagna, and of the imperial letter, destroying in principle temporal power of the Pope.

Therefore, there was nothing serious in these treaties of Villafranca and Zurich, if not for the cession of Lombardy to Piedmont and only as a complete; everything else was just a without ambiguity, and what was only of a possible, conditional nature. The Two emperors, having resolved to make peace, came to an agreement, and they It consists of two parts: one that they settled immediately, such as the transfer from Lombardy to the Emperor of the French, a fictitious, imagined cession to safeguard Austria's pride; the other party, which has composed of a series of promises and indications. Here's what the two emperors have said to themselves; – I may have some authority to say so, since chance had it that I was the intermediary in this negotiation tion: – We agree on certain points which depend on We will fix these points; for the rest, which does not depend on us, we we will, so to speak, only indicate desires; and after much Following discussions, these desires were in turn written in the pre-preliminaries.

Circumstances had placed the throne in the hands of his cousin, but family secrets relating to the birth of the latter, for which he had the evidence in hand in the disavowal of King Louis's paternity obliged the emperor to reckon with him. If his youth had prevented him from playing, like him, a role in the Carbonaro, its revolutionary principles were not less certain. In October 1851, shortly before the election from a grand master for France, the newspaper Le Franc-Maçon (3^e year, p. 41) gave a list of thirteen candidates presented as the most deserving of promotion to the rank of Grand Master. The candidate who is second in rank and is designated as follows: "Napoleon Bonaparte, representative of the people, initiated in 1848 into the Friends of the Fatherland by Brother Desanlis, the last president of the Grand Orient.– Portrait:

On several occasions, the emperor sought to compromise his cousin. The brutal impiety, the morals crude, scandals of this character's domestic life They served him in this design. But this one, even before being the Victor Emmanuel's son-in-law, had, through secret societies, a force of its own that prevailed over his crowned cousin.

He was always, at the heart of his reign, the representative of the idea of re-revolutionary, which was the raison d'être of the imperial dictatorship. Inside, he gathered around him a considerable fraction of democracy, which hailed him as a disgraced Caesar, and which was represented by Le Siècle and V Opinion nationale, the newspapers most influential of the time. As for foreign policy, he pushed knows how to energetically accentuate it more and more in the direction revolutionary, and here is how he presented it to the Senate.*

"Gentlemen, I still need to emphasize the fundamental question." of our discussion, the one that is undoubtedly the most difficult to to make triumph in the mind of the Senate: I am referring to the unity of Italy. This unity, gentlemen, was the inevitable result of the war. of 1859: I foresaw it, and that is why, I confess, I was by herbalist of this war. POLITICS MUST NOW BE CONDUCTED FRANKLY and openly!

In summary, the confederation was a mere hypothesis put forward by France, and this hypothesis was rejected by all those concerned.

The main players in this drama were, besides Palmerston, Mazzini, Cavour and Napoleon III.

Mazzini was still pursuing the implementation of the Young-Italy: a united, republican and democratic Italy.

Mazzini, forced by his defeat in 1848, to yield to the ascendancy Palmerston had accepted the Piedmontese monarchy, only on the condition that Italy be one; but he only submitted to his body defending the Napoleonic dictatorship. He reserved the right to do to him a silent war and to remind him from time to time of his commitments gages by his henchmen.

Farini had to stay there, and to this would find a pretext that would mislead the French government or more early on, the opinion; for it is difficult for me to believe that the imperial cabinet had took the Modena comedy seriously for even a single moment, no more than... others played in Italy. This is where we stopped, in a long conversation I had with the governor on this subject; or rather, here is what It happened because the program was followed exactly.

"On the day set for Farini's departure, I posted myself in the Place du Châ I had brought in a portion of my men; I had summoned them to bolster the ranks number, all the carabinieri and police officers who were present at Reggio: Carpi, Mirandola and Pavullo. I had been sent to Naples. The Turin office was beginning to conceive to see a deep-seated mistrust towards Garibaldi. It was known that the Mazzinians were very active in Naples, where they were brought together their main leaders: Mazzini, Saffi, Mordini and Mario. We feared that Garibaldi, lacking political intelligence and more than mediocre this administrator, should not allow himself to be swayed by the machinations of the republicans, clerics, and finally this Neapolitan revolution, whose rapid results, it must be said, were less due to the weapons of the adventurer generally, than to the money of Piedmont (in the hands of the Carbonari and Freemasons), did not turn into the Turin debacle. In short, the ministry already saw the ghost of southern Italy constituted as a Republic, under the pre Garibaldi's residence. These fears were, at least as much as the position The embarrassed situation of the southern army in front of Capua, the reasons decisive factors in the sudden invasion of the Marches. My mission was therefore to ascertain the true state of affairs and to combat the influences that could divert Garibaldi away from Piedmontese interests.

Caserta was in an even more incredible state of disarray. The army was teeming with women: Milady "White" and Admiral Emile were the heroines; the Nights were spent in orgies... Garibaldi was no longer recognizable when he didn't satisfy his passion for popularity by getting acclaimed sea in the streets of Naples; he divided his time between Milady and Alexandre Dumas, who followed him everywhere. This very serious incident was officially noted in a press release, written shortly afterwards in Castiglione by Cardinal Antonelli to Mgr McGliani, nuncio in Paris. The Secretary of State, in this dispatch refuted the accusation of impotence leveled against the papal government through an anonymous and unofficial brochure: France, Rome and Italy, written by the same hand as The Pope and Congress.

Cardinal Antonelli speaks in this dispatch in these highly significant terms, despite the diplomatic style that envelope :

I am deliberately refraining here from any research on the circumstances which prevented the restoration of the Pope's authority in Romagna. For his part, here is what he wrote about Mr. de Grammont's dispatch. Grammont M. de Quatrebarbes, governor of Ancône, in a letter reproduced by most newspapers of the time:

"On September 11 or 12, when the brave Colonel Sapi was defending himself heroically in Fesaro, in an open city, one against twenty, facing of the Piedmontese army, the French consul in Ancona, Mr. de Courcy, He rushed in full force to the delegation's palace where I was staying. He held in his hand a telegraphic dispatch he had just received, signed: Duke of Grammont, ambassador to Rome: "The emperor will not tolerate "the guilty invasion of the Papal States by the Piedmontese lay government. I guarantee its strict meaning on my word. I went immediately with Mr. de Courcy at the consular palace, and we agreed that, for to stop the bloodshed that was flowing freely in an unequal struggle and impious, one of the consulate employees would immediately go to his post to Pcsaro, to communicate the dispatch to the army's commander-in-chief Piedmontese. A few hours later, the representative of the consul of France did indeed hand over this dispatch to the Piedmontese general, who simply handed over a receipt, then walked on without another concern of the French government's defense.

"I will not repeat here the words attributed to Generals Fanti and Cialdini to explain their audacity. It's easy to be mistaken. Also, Mr. de Thouvenel, not only shortly afterwards rejected the offers made by Spain and Austria to intervene jointly with France in the custody of the Holy Father and from Rome, but brought these powers, with the help of the Mason nothing, by the principle of non-intervention, and as the only a means of pacifying and legitimizing the fait accompli, to recognize between themselves the kingdom and the king of Italy (1). And yet at the same time Ricasoli proclaimed in full parliament I was setting the goal pursued by the Italian Revolution:

Yes, we want to go to Rome! Rome, politically separated from the rest of Italy will remain the center of intrigues and conspiracies, a permanent threat to public order. So, going to Rome is for For the Italians, it is not only a right, but an inexorable necessity. But how should we go about it? Enfantin's letters during this entire period are very cute laughing, because they reveal the intimate conversations that were being exchanged then between the Tuileries and the Palais-Royal.

In the early months of 1861, Enfantin wrote:

And when the confident and disillusioned conservatives did to hear their legitimate demands, a whole range of measures hostile to the clergy was inaugurated.

As early as 1860, the Minister of Religious Affairs, Mr. Rouland, addressed to the em- They wrote a confidential memorandum, outlining an entire plan to to gradually and quietly bring about the subjugation of the Church. Mr. Rouland naively said the following about this:

"It is impossible for the secular element to fight on this ground against the religious element which, in reality or in appearance, will always present to families with far greater guarantees of morality and devotion, t

A little further on, the minister reveals the secret of his ten-prepared for secular education:

"The laypeople, modest and useful civil servants," he said, "are devoted" to the emperor and render notable services in the rural communes those, where one would be greatly weakened from the point of view of universal suffrage, i All primary education was placed in the hands of religious orders.

And further down:

"Where do people cordially shout: Long live the Emperor? Surely it is not not in religious institutions.

In conclusion, the minister proposed dissolving the companies tés de St Vincent-de-Pau 1, by application of articles 291 and 292 of the penal code and to appeal "to an anti-religious reaction" who would police the clergy's transgressions and form around them He faces a circle of resistance and opposition that is stifling him. rait (1). »

(1) The main part will be found at the end of this volume in the attached documents. this thesis.

This plan was followed faithfully:

The Society of St. Vincent de Paul was disorganized by the measures taken by Mr. de Persigny, at the same time as France-Freemasonry was once again legally recognized; the press, which was then subject to an absolutely discretionary regime, had any permission to insult and slander the clergy; the councils provincials were prohibited; in certain cities and in the departments where beliefs were more fervent, the prefects multiplied cabarets and brothels for business to overcome religious resistance.

A new Minister of Public Instruction, Mr. Duruy, declared would therefore wage a silent war against religious education, and he was seeking to fulfill one of the program's dearest wishes Masonic, by inaugurating an education for young girls of the State, which would have been a preparation for androgynous lodges.

At the same time, one of the most advanced leaders of Freemasonry in France, Mr. Jean Macé, a professor at the University, organized, with the dual competition of Freemasonry and the administration of the Institute of public education, the League of Education, whose stated goal was to destroy all religious teaching in schools and to corrupt the masses through popular libraries (i).

Italy.

Napoleon III, compliant with Palmerston's direction, had left to be accomplished without intervention, despite France's obvious interest and the advice of the most basic wisdom, the events of 1866, which broke Austria and paved the way for the unification of Germany under Prussia. This was the implementation of the plan established as early as 1849. (Book 2, Chapter IX, § 8). At the same time, the dualism introduced in Austria-Hungary was sketching out, for a future not yet realized, the Hungarian-Polish kingdom.

The French government not only let it happen, but it even went so far as to attempt to justify these events through the speeches of Mr. Rouher and the diplomatic dispatches of Mr. de Lavalette.

Prince Napoleon was showing himself here, as always, to be the bad guy. genius of the empire, and the following passage from his famous speech in Ajaccio shows how the policy pursued by Mr. de Lava-

We must be allies of Prussia and Italy, and our Armies will be engaged in the fight within two months.

Unfortunately for Napoleon III, Lord Palmerston died. and from then on a shift of influence occurred which was to be his fatal. Neither M. de Bismarck nor Mazzini were any longer restrained.

At that time, England had a ministry headed by Mr. Gladstone, a student from Palmerston, one of the most disloyal members of the conspiracy hatched in 1856 against the Pope and the King of Naples, the shameful approver of Mr. de's Kulturkampf Bismarck in 1873. Lord Granville communicated his actions to Lord Lyons, concert with Prussia and Russia, with the governments from Denmark, Italy, and Austria, to prevent these countries to rally to France.

Mr. Bismarck had therefore been able to prepare for war against France which was to crown his work, and Mazzini was free to enjoy the first favorable opportunity to break the man he is suffering under knows the dictatorship impatiently.

Following recriminations between Mr. Bismarck and La Mar-Mora, curious revelations have been made about the relationships of Mazzini with M. de Bismarck.

Here are two notes that the Italian agitator sent him via the intermediary of Mr. d'Usedom, Prussian minister, in Florence. They provide the key to the events of 1870. The first is dated Lugano, November 17, 1867:

But beyond temporal power, it is spiritual power that The Revolution wants to achieve.

"The granite foundation of Italy's future policy must be the war against Catholicism, across the entire globe, said in the Turin Chamber of Deputies; on July 12, 1862, a of the heads of Italian Masonry, Petruccelli della Gattina... We must fight against Catholic dominance in the world "From everywhere, and by any means necessary."

The so-called moderates, their ilk, have only accomplished hypocritically, Garibaldi's infamous threats. All the property Church property was plundered, religious congregations were destroyed, priests subject to military service, civil marriage established, the public education has become atheist, and the businesses of sects... more abominable solidarity groups highly sponsored by agents of the government, that's how Freemasonry triumphed Phante implemented Cavour's hypocritical program: The Free Church in the free state, and if it has not extended to greater excesses again, the cause lies solely in remorse and the struggles of conscience of Victor Emmanuel and his son.

But Freemasonry was no less oppressive to the people than for the Church. Its domination is that of a predatory caste which reduced them to famine and pellagra (the disease of hunger) these countries, once so rich and so happy. The Revue de France has drawn, in its issue of December 1, 1878, a table as well It is indeed distressing to see the tyranny of Freemasonry:

PRUSSIA AND THE MASONIC EMPIRE

I. – The Masonic Genesis of Prussia.

We have no information revealing the share taken by the Masonic sect at the first development of power descendants of the apostate grand master of the Teutonic order. We only know by what intrigues he was seized in 1701 to the emperor the recognition of the royal title in their favor.

We have already described above (Book II, Chapter III, Section 2) the part Frederick II's actions regarding the spread of Freemasonry, the support he found in her; we have quoted the testimony of Grand Master Bluntschli, dating from his accession the beginning from the era of the Revolution. He is one of his lieutenants, a prince, vassal of Prussia, the Duke of Brunswick, whom all the Masonic orders united to make their grand master aucon- the winds of Wilhelmbad in 1782; it was thanks to the diplomatic strategy Prussia's tick that the coalition of princes turned into a pure war of conquest, an intervention against the Revolution which should have been essentially selfless.

From that time onward, the idea of destroying was established within the sects. the Holy Roman Empire and the House of Austria, to unite all Germany into a centralized empire under the Prussian dynasty. One of Weishaupt's followers, the Marquis of Constanza, wrote Already :

measures taken in Bavaria against Weishaupt (book II, chapter V, § 5), the apostate Fessler, who had just become the inspiration for Joseph II in his sad campaign against the Church (Book II, Chapter V, § 4), he went to settle in Prussia, where, according to Eckhart, "he had set himself the task to give an external form to the goal and means of the Enlightenment." There he organized the Grand Royal Lodge of York to Friendship, of which he had the skill to get William III to accept the patronage. Thanks to this tactic, this lodge, where the purest was preserved the spirit of the Illuminism, survived the measures taken in 1794 by the Duke of Brunswick (Book II, Chapter VI, § 13), and she served, as we shall see, from the core to the anti-Christian conspiracy and anti-social (2). That same year, at the Diet of Regensburg, the Prussia opposed Austria's demand to ban lodges. Masonic throughout the empire (3).

In 1802, the Holy Roman Empire was destroyed, and with it the last to deny the remnants of Charlemagne's grand vision. Prussia was of all the Germanic powers, the one that benefited the most from the secularization of ecclesiastical principalities. As we have seen (Book II, Chapter VIII, § 4), his chief minister at that time, Mr. de Haugwitz was in charge of Freemasonry and of Laume III and his ministers became fully involved in the Tugendbund, whose patriotic thinking was so singularly mixed with the tendencies of Freemasonry (book II, cliap. VIII, § 1). After Napoleon's defeat, the King of Prussia refused to give a constitution, and from that moment the struggle seemed to take shape in to be the monarchy and secret societies. Meanwhile, there had The congress of Verona took place, where Mr. de Ilaugwitz addressed the sovereigns his revelations about the true purpose of sects and the impossibility of them to govern as Prussia had tried to do since 1797.

The sovereigns' response to this communication was Quite different. Here's how Mr. de Gloden tells it:

"This memoir produced a... about the emperors Francis and Alexander a deeper impression than the author could have hoped for. In Austria In Russia, it's over for a long time, and perhaps for all days of Freemasonry. And how did William III conduct himself? to whom the report of his former minister was addressed, and whom his friends and His allies urged others to follow their example? A few years later, L'Orient, a monthly Masonic review, Paris, 1844–1845, reproduced the following extract from the Gazette de Leiptiek:

The lodges judged that Prussia was among all the European states most capable of carrying out their work, and they have made it the cornerstone of their political action, without letting themselves be to consult through hesitations and sometimes even through half-hearted attempts reactionaries of the successor of William III.

II. – German unity

From 1821 onwards, all of German Freemasonry converged towards Berlin: it was like a branch of the administration, conducted to a specific goal with the stiffness of hand characteristic of the BU-Prussian maucracy. If the lodges tolerated this despotism, It was because, by enduring it, they only worked harder. surely towards the accomplishment of the great Masonic work (1).

The idea of the reunification of Germany under his rule continued to be the goal of all the lodges. Here, among others, is a curious story extracted from the memoirs of General Lamarque, where he recounts his interview with Count B... in 1826:

GERMAN UNIT 401

By dropping these last two names into the conversation, the count B... had wanted to mislead General Lamarque, or even to maintain the Masonic alliance between liberals and Bonapartists, because the Prince of Baden was allied with the Bonaparte family.

Prince Louis-Napoleon, who even before his political fortune was very familiar with the views of secret societies, had sought to enter into this plan as early as 1845 with the Duke of Brunswick.

A book published in London in 1867, under the title: Letters and correspondence from Th. Slingby-Duncombe, gives details quite curious and little known about the relationships that fire Duke of Brunswick and Napoleon III, when the latter was only pretender. The Englishman Slingby-Duncombe was related to the earl de Dorsay, Louis-Napoleon's personal friend, and, either out of self-interest, either through a kind of romantic fantasy, he worked on part of his life to serve the cause of Prince Napoleon and the deposed Duke Brunswick's secretary. He was the first to have the idea of doing to use the enormous fortune of the "Diamond Duke" for projects Napoleon, for his part, pledged to restore the Duke to his States and to promote the unification of Germany. With the aim to bring about an agreement between the two contenders, Mr. Duncombe in 1845 sent his private secretary, Mr. Smith, to Ham, where Prince Napoleon was being held. Smith had a long conversation with the prince, who signed the following agreement:

"We, the undersigned, Duke of Brunswick and Prince Louis Bonaparte, Let us agree on the following:

"Article 1. We promise and swear on our honor and on the holy Gospel, on the one hand, to restore the Duke of Brunswick to his duchy, and, if possible, to create a united national Germany, and to give it a constitution that meets the progress and needs of the spirit of the times; on the other hand, to assist Prince Napoleon in his the aim of restoring to France the exercise of its national sovereignty, as it was recognized in 1830, so that the country could, in all freedom, deciding on the form of government that best meets his interests.

But Emperor Nicholas, who in 1848 had so energetically contributed to the repression of the Revolution, and died in 1855. The defeats suffered in Crimea and the administrative disorganization the Russian Empire's policies inclined his successor Alexander II to pursue a completely different policy. In turn, Frederick William IV died in 1861, leaving the crown to a less scrupulous brother.

On the other hand, this Simon Deutsch was a member of the steering committee of the Young-Türkiye, which is a branch of Freemasonry and which dethroned Abd-ul-Azis. It was not without reason that Mr. Disraeli, in September 1876, at the Aylesbury banquet, publicly pointed out the large role that secret societies played in agitations in the East, from which the war between Russia and Turkey arose (v. Introduction, II).

In 1877, some newspapers highlighted the name of Simon Deutsch as possible governor of Bosnia in one of the many combinations that were being developed. Diplomacy would then be 11! Simon Deutsch died in 1878.

406 THE POWER AND THE MASONIC EMPIRE

Austria itself is due to the complicity that Prussia makes contracted everywhere among the lodge members. As early as 1861, a meeting of all the rites of German Freemasonry had taken place in the form of a federation entitled Verein deutscher Freimaurer, and had chosen F.*. Seydel as president. Thanks to this union, the work of unification, was carried out ostentatiously, indefinitely even depending on what the leaders could do

in Germany

After Prussia's great successes, a skillful character said that "it was the Prussian schoolmasters who had gained the Battle of Sadowa!" Like all impactful phrases, "Given the Battle of Sadowa!" That one has been repeated everywhere, especially in France. Nothing is more False, if one wants to see it as proof of the development of power The health of peoples through primary education. Freemasonry, master of education 407

"It follows from this report that 8,200 students were attending in 1818 the courses from twenty-one universities, including six Catholic ones, half and fourteen Protestants; that the German population, being 27,500,000 souls, yields approximately 288 students per million, of which 150 are at fewer are affiliated with Illuminism, or with secret societies, under the name of Tugendbund, Freemasons, Burschenschafts, Black Band, etc.; and that finally more than half of the generation that will take part in Public affairs in Germany is imbued with the principles of the sect. One man, however, stands out above all others in this work. corruption of younger generations, that's the Prussian minister, the high mason of AlSkentein during the reign of Frederick William IV.

Let us leave aside the Archbishop of Cologne, the Athanasius of Germany, to summarize, in his book on peace between the Church and the States, The entire process of this infernal tactic:

"It is on the grounds of schools," he writes, "that the minister of Alskentein strived primarily to attack its vital principle, to dissolve to eradicate and to extirpate Catholicism more specifically, but at the same time also Christianity as a whole.

"He had gradually become master, not only of the universes not only the cities, but also all the gymnasiums, all the schools secondary schools and even primary schools in the cities and the campaigns. For even the smallest village school, he had determined and prcscj'it the study plan, the textbooks and even those that shouldn't to be used only for simple reading. He had taken the most meticulous care to ensure that all these books were suitable for insinuating and propagating, under artificial and slightly veiled forms, all doctrines and anti-Catholic tendencies, although he tolerated nothing that would have could have resembled an open attack against the Catholic Church or against Christianity. There, all control became virtually impossible, and, it must be admitted, to the shame of some bishops and their clergy, this control was not even attempted by them. Unfortunately Fortunately, they paid little attention to the appointment of schoolteachers. For most of them, this meant emancipation from all ecclesiastical influence had taken on the character of a fixed idea. In the eastern provinces of Prussia, the priest and the schoolmaster, when they are not both imbued with rationalist sympathies, they find themselves in a better situation. Their situation is the same, and has been for a long time. in these ways.

"Leave us the schools," said the minister from Alskentein, "and we We will gladly leave you the pomp of your worship, the splendors of your hierarchy, your bishops and your chapters; we will honor them even outside, and we will protect them; for they serve us, for a time again, a cloak to cover our views and our measures, and by their We keep Catholics at ease. But when once what is essential to Catholicism will be erased from the hearts of your people, when that the chain of your traditions will be broken, your hierarchy will fall of itself like an old rag; it will go and blend into the rubbish that the broom throws outside; it will be trampled under everyone's feet, unless we were willing to save it, by classifying it among the other state officials.

IV. – Masonic work in Austria

The same Masonic work is carried out with a relentless determination. The same was true in the Austrian Empire.

The meeting of Austrian schoolteachers, in a kind of the congress in Vienna, on September 5, 6, and 7, 1867, announced to world that secret societies ruled there as elsewhere theirs, and gave the explanation for the dissolution of this poor empire, worse, which is rapidly disappearing.

A judicious observer, Mr. Xavier Roux, outlines for us a public information office in Austria in 1878, which shows well the fruits of the impetus given to public information by a series of Freemason ministers.

Having observed that under the veil of the Froebel method Religious indifferentism reaches primary school and that no Christian thought is only shown in official books the The government is imposing this on nursery schools and other schools, he adds:

"It is in university teaching that they appear with the more evidently the anti-Christian intentions of the liberals of Austria. There, professors who are completely free in their thinking teach at the distinguished youth of the empire the most dangerous doctrines. V. – The Masonic Empire and the Kulturkampf

The German Empire was established by Freemasonry, and it showing faithfulness to that origin by declaring war on Catholicism, by launching one of the most daring assaults against him worldwide It was difficult that he still had to endure anything like that.

It was in the shadows that Mr. d'Arnim, during the Council of the Vatican, plotting his treacherous incitements to schism, and that on the 20th In September 1870 he became an accomplice of the invaders of Rome. 412 PRUSSIA and the Masonic Empire

Prussia no longer had any enemies in Germany and the Catholics liques, not content with having shed their blood on the fields of battle, hastened to offer their loyalty to the German Empire, It was then that, without any motive and against his most obvious interest Mr. Bismarck inaugurated a religious struggle that will be the stumbling block of the new building.

With the haste and agitation that are characteristic of his personality, Mr. Bismarck, in the space of three years, changed the entire Prussian constitution and enacted the series of laws that make everywhere part of the Masonic program. As early as 1871, the law on inspection The school board, voted on by the Prussian Landtag, stripped the ministers of religion, Catholic and Protestant, by their authority cular on schools to transfer it to nominal officials administered by the State. When the legitimate and unanimous protests of the episcopate broke out, the Prussian government already had two plans ready laws which are the most monstrous inventions of the theory of the religious supremacy of the State over the spiritual order.

One, concerning the appointment and education of clerics, removes from the bishops the power by divine right they have to confer the sacrament doce. Under the terms of this law, they could no longer order than subjects who would have first obtained a certificate of completion

That is the fundamental article of this law, which goes so far as to authorize the government the need to depose, if necessary, the clergymen whose maintenance in their duties would be incompatible with public order.

All of these laws recall, article by article, certain projects of Napoleon I, later timidly taken up by the government of Louis-Philippe. There was only one country where the Christian populations defended protested against this invasion: these were Romania and the Eastern provinces of Turkey. II. – Freemasonry and the Commune

Freemasonry in Paris strongly sided with the Commune, we say. On April 26, 1871, a large assembly Freemasons of all rites met at the Châtelet, and after having chosen as speaker one of the party's best-known members radical, F.*. Floquet, she made the following resolution:

A delegation from the Commune escorted the delegation conical all the way to the temple on Cadet Street.

A few days later, the Freemasons went onto the ramparts parts opposed their banners to the troops commanded by the marshal Chal de Mac-Mahon, and the venerable masters of the lodges of Paris were asking themselves highly as mediators between the Assembly, the sovereign legal of the country, and the band of cosmopolitan revolutionaries who terrorized the capital.

We have recounted elsewhere (Book I, Chapter III, §4) the singular incidents that occurred between the Masonic delegation and the General M*', who commanded the outposts and who was to be a brother. Mr. Thiers received the delegation, but refused for the time being to make no commitment. A few days later, on May 5th, the federation of Freemasons and Companions of Paris addressed a manifesto to their brothers in France and around the world, where, after presenting their intervention, they would say:

"Brothers in Freemasonry and fellow craftsmen, we no longer have to to make resolutions other than that of fighting and covering with our sacred aegis, the cause of justice.

"We intend to strictly enforce the decrees of the Commune: an office is set up in each town hall."

As we can see, just as under the Convention, the lodges are transforming formed into Jacobin clubs and committees of public safety (see book II, Chapter VI, Section 14).

Finally, on May 22nd, when the French army had already entered In Paris, a large group of Freemasons met one last time and published under the name of the Grand Orient the following claim:

"Freemasons of all rites and all ranks, the Commune, Defender of your sacred principles, she calls you to her side!

"The instruction we received in our respectable workshops dictates to each of us the sacred duty that we have to fulfill.

"Blessed are those who fall gloriously in this holy struggle!"

The Grand Orient of France subsequently disavowed the practice which was made in his name. But what allows us to measure the port The result of this disavowal is the support that has since then been given by the powerful Masonic sessions from abroad have given to the Commune, they who had nothing to spare. We will cite these important documents ments in one of the following chapters (book II, chapter XIV, § 7)(1).

As for French Freemasonry, its action was more decisive in favour of the Revolution, but on a different level.

424 THE REPUBLIC OF 1870

Indeed, from the very beginning of the Commune, a great name lodges in the provinces sent threatening petitions to the Assembly to ask him for reconciliation, the proclamation of communal franchises and of the republic (1).

What the Assembly did not grant them, Mr. Thiers granted them. He promised, and he kept that promise.

Mr. Thiers is now the man who will save the Revolution.

Through a strange blindness, religious men had worn it in power through their multiple elections. But Mr. Thiers was always remained faithful to his oath as a Kadosh knight (v. book. II, chap. VIII, § 5), and the words should not have been forgotten which he delivered on January 17, 1848, in the Chamber of Deputies:

"It is said that the men who have just triumphed in Switzerland are radicals; because we think we've said it all by accusing them of radicalism.

Once he had the situation under control, Mr. Thiers abandoned the propaganda revolutionary action is once again spreading across the country. It is up to the pressure from its agents was the reason for the success of a number of republican elections, on July 2, 1871. But above all he employed the remarkable abilities of his mind to disintegrate the majority royalist of the assembly, to stir up distrust between men everything brought them closer together, and made the situations worse.

In vain did the National Assembly, by the act of May 24, 1873, resume- She was in control of herself; the damage was largely done and The restoration of the monarchy was no longer approached with simplicity, which imposed it on everyone in Bordeaux in February 1871, in Versailles in May 1871.

Our framework does not include an account of the events that led to the restoration of the true monarchy failed in November 1873.

The moment of truth has not yet arrived; it will reveal without doubt, alongside men led astray by the prejudices of Catholicism liberal, the hand of skillful sectarians, seeking to impose once still to the monarchy the bastard regime that had cornered the Restoration tion in the charter and consolidated the work of the Revolution thanks to

We must simply note the strong opposition that to the restoration of the monarchy, Mr. Bismarck. The debates providential, we might say, events from Arnim's trial have revealed the powerful interest he had in removing from the throne France, the prince who could have best restored its grandeur.

He kept repeating in his dispatches: "that Germany he had nothing to fear from either the republic or the empire; that his interest was that France would remain weak and without allies; that the republic and, failing a republic, an empire was the regime under the which France would be least able to recover from; that France a monarchically constituted system would be a danger to the empire from Germany because the monarchy would be capable of concluding alliances... » All statesmen, all newspapers Mands have repeatedly stated that "the regime which, by acclimatizing in France, would best serve Prussia's interests, and was the regime "Me, a Republican."

The possibility of a Bonapartist restoration in the event of the republic could not be maintained, was, as we can see, itself carefully managed by our enemies and served by them with discretion.

Mr. d'Arnim wrote to the Chancellor on May 6, 1872:

a We must not reject Bonapartist attempts to to connect with us. They are the only ones of all parties who seek openly expressed our support, and which includes in its program The reconciliation with Germany.* »

On May 12th, Mr. Bismarck replied:

"The Bonapartist imperial party is probably the one with the help which one could still most reasonably flatter oneself with establishing "Tolerable relations between Germany and France."

He therefore recommended not to do "anything at all" that could weaken him, harm him in the eyes of the nation, or render His position is more difficult.

Bonapartist restoration or republic, that's what Mr. do Bismarck was working to establish in France! "Neither Bourbons nor Or "Léans," he said one day in front of his table companion, Dr. Busch. Later, seeing the republic and the republicans playing his game so well, he exclaimed with his political cynicism that "the France was in a playful agony!!!

A few years later, when Mac-Mahon, on May 16, 1877, had a desire to escape the revolutionary current in which He had placed himself in position, all the forces of the cosmopolitan Revolution and in particular the liberal press and the Masonic lodges of Germany Magne allied themselves with the 363 left-wing deputies and made with them the election campaign which culminated in the vote of the 14th October 1877 and to the submission of the marshal.

The attitude of Masonic lodges in France and Germany and Mr. Bismarck's actions after May 16, 1877 are too similar. their attitude and actions at the time of the restoration The monarchical order was being prepared, so that we would not have it from the now noted.

events that had taken place, as having had the most of great importance to Freemasonry. The lodges resumed then with even greater fervor their anti-Christian propaganda work and demagogic.

The empire, by taking Freemasonry under its protection, had contributed to bringing in a number of elements conservatives. Mr. de Marcère should also have enjoyed a political fortune which contrasted his very mediocre talent with his status as a Freemason. If we are to believe La Vraie France, from Lille, November 1878, the former member of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul allegedly he joined Freemasonry in 1866. He never, as far as we know, denied this allegation published in the capital of the department which He was a member of parliament.

The inconsequential attempt of May 16, 1877, by its failure, than to increase the power of the lodges. The ministry, which counted always within its ranks, Mr. Decazes, not knowing how to attack the Revolution, nor even less what he wanted to put in its place in case of success, was destined to fail in the struggle so poorly begun against She.

The lodges have entered the electoral arena even more openly only in 1876.

THE REPUBLIC OF 1870

Here are, among others, some excerpts from the speech given in July 1877, by the Venerable Master of the Lodge La Triple Essence, in Saint-Malo:

"Yes, my brothers, the republic will live; it will live, despite the obstacles obstacles that are placed in his path to hinder his steady progress, incessant, towards the future.

"Since our last Masonic revival banquet, great events events have occurred. In this room, which we occupy this evening,

"The treacherous advice of this black group was, it seems, heeded." and followed, and soon after all the other citizens who possessed the the nation's trust, carrying high the torch of truth, seeking to enlighten humankind about the machinations of the clerics – that was the their greatest crime – were forced to leave power.

"Since that act, freedom has veiled its head, and we, its true..." Friends, we have donned our mourning clothes. Let us groan! Let us groan! Let us groan! sounds U! as we do in the temple at our funeral ceremonies; But let us never lose heart!

The submission, then the retreat of Marshal Mac-Mahon, have read successively the expectations of the lodges and brought, conformed in line with the plan outlined in Locarno, the dictatorship of Gambetta, dictatorship a ture all the more powerful because it declines responsibilities apparent power. Never has a parliamentary majority obeyed a more rigorous discipline than that which has been observed in

Chamber of Deputies. It has even been claimed that at certain times

V. — Freemasonry in power

The increasingly significant share taken by Franc-Ma-The stupidity of the course of political events in France is due, according to the newspaper Le Français, to the energetic leadership that receives from a man whose portrait he thus paints:

"The government of the Grand Orient and the lodges, very numerous
The management of the businesses that depend on it is entrusted to a council composed of thirty-three members, elected by the general assembly of delegates of the different lodges. This council constitutes its own bureau.
The president has been a poor old man for the past few years.
Completely incapable of taking any serious action, Brother Saint-Jean, Doctor of Medicine. In fact, one of the men who knew, through their zeal and personal worth, obtain a certain au-torité, is F.*. Cousin, vice-president of the council of the order.
Mr. Cousin, chief inspector in charge of the special service of the ex-operations at the Northern Railway, actively involved in the Freemasonry. More educated than most of the characters in which he is involved in this society, enjoying, it is said, a possessing a rather remarkable talent for speaking, he is one of the men of action beyond Freemasonry. It was Mr. Cousin who, in recent years, released from wresting control of the boxes from the characters vulgar, mediocre, and uncultured people who governed them, and endeavored to bring in well-known, educated men and more or less distinguished in mind. No one has the disgust for the silly phraseology, which until recently time in use in the lodges; no one judges, I am assured, with Freemasons are complacent; no one works more actively at to make the Grand Orient a fighting institution, to free the Freemasonry of childishness and outdated ideas. President Mr. Charles, from the lodge La Clément Amitié, one of the most active Cousin brought in Messrs. Littré, Wyruboff, and Jules Ferry. With For him, the most important members of the council of the order are: Mr. Andrieux, the Radical deputy from the Rhône, who was appointed prosecutor of the republic in Lyon by the government of September 4th, had to be dismissed by Mr. Dufaure following a declaration of theism and materialism made publicly in the exercise of functions of the public prosecutor's office; Mr. de Ilérédia, one of the members the most violent members of the Paris City Council, Mr. Albert Joly, Rossel's friend, lawyer, and one of his executors, today a left-wing member of parliament; Mr. André Rousselle, who, as deputy mayor of the sixth arrondissement, he showed himself during the headquarters in Paris, and in particular on October 31, heavily involved in the revolutionary party, and was formed in the department of Oise, the servant of the most advanced demagoguery; finally, Mr. Massicault, director of the press under the ministry of Mr. Jules Simon, today prefect in Limoges, and who, already prefect in 1871, in this city, had to be revoked by the government of Mr. Thiers. These are the names of the members of the council of the Grand Orient order, as provided to me by the Masonic Calendar of Grand-Orient, year 5877 (vulgo 1877), indicate sufficient the nature of the inspirations to which this advice is often given (1).

Under this skillful direction and harmonization with the spirit of the time (see Introduction, § IV), Freemasonry quickly acquired a much more effective action on the direction of public opinion-

It acts all by particularly through the lectures given in the lodges, where the opinion of the brothers is formed and where so much is made of it as an instrument propaganda messages.

The Masonic World (January and April 1876 issues) gives the list of topics discussed this winter in the lodges of Paris. Among other things, we note the following topics: human morality • Maine;- a speech by Jean-Jacques; - necessities of liberation to dismantle the morality of religious dogmatism; - Diderot and his, duties of the brothers delegated to gather information on the laypeople proposed for initiation, etc., etc. (1).

As early as 1877, the lodge La Clémentine began studying the question taxation, and Father Paschal Duprat summarizes the following:
Vaux: "This is not the least of the advantages of our work."
"for having allowed all our Brothers* to understand and appreciate"
"the financial reform plan of the budget committee pre-

They are the questions on the agenda of republican politics.

Thanks to this activity, Gambetta became the undisputed dictator tested by the French Republic. Its power has precisely the characteristics of the one who gives rise to secret societies: he has no no legal responsibility and remains outwardly outside of constitutional action and yet as president of the budget committee, since as president of the House (a position which until then was considered to exclude the one who (he was clothed in the arena of parties), he has an unknown power

sects, which are dominated by the most influential men, to this very fraction that has been left to its own devices during the Commune (see above § I).

For those familiar with the composition of the Republican party, the successes obtained twice in a row at the last minute by Gambetta in The elections in Bordeaux and Lyon are a manifestation of forces that work with him. They have been quite powerful. to dominate Jacobin excitement in the name of higher disinterests of the party, interests which are linked to combinations relating to the general European policy.

That the current government of the French Republic is essentially a Masonic government, that's what results due to the fact that official positions are occupied almost exclusively- by the Freemasons. Here is a table by the Frenchman, on May 17 and 19, 1879, which raised no objections and that We supplement this with some details by mentioning the sources.

It seems that the status of Freemason has become indispensable conceivable for holding a public office.

All of Paris knows that on the eve of the decree which, in July 1879, completely renewed the Council of State, a proposal was made to a senior civil servant, long-standing republican, to be part of it.
After his acceptance, the person who made him this offer added that there was only one preliminary formality to complete, that of to be initiated as a Freemason in the evening, a kid: "A pure ceremony, him

On August 3, 1880, a Freemason wrote from Caen to the Chain

We had the honor, or rather the pleasure, of receiving on Saturday last in our L.*. Saint-Jean-de-Thémis:

"Mr. Gravier, Prefect of Calvados;

(i) The Chain of Union > August–September 1880 issue. This story has a worthy counterpart the Masonic reception held in Lille in May 1880, at the F.–. Jules Ferry, and which we let us borrow from a particular correspondence of the Journal of Freemasonry Belgian of the 13th and 20th days of the 4th month, 1880.

Upon Jules Ferry's arrival in Lille and along his route, there was the entire population Republican lation of our Or. and neighboring municipalities, all members of republican circles, and in the middle of this enthusiastic crowd, the hundred or so masons of the North Star, all well known in Lille, and who, like all their political friends, fled to give a standing ovation to the Minister of Public Instruction.

"On Saturday evening, the logo was received at the prefecture, but the attendance was so s

Freemasonry in power 459

A few days later, the F.*. Gravier was equipped with a re-

Saint-Maixent, she took care to have noted the presence among the authorities of F.*. Guimbault, delegate of the Masonic lodges ques [Avenir de Vienne, May 17, 1880.]

She is increasingly trying to infiltrate the army; that's how which can be read in the Chaîne d'Union of May-June 1880:

"L. the Temple of the Friends of French Honor. Or. - , of Paris.- The May 17th, this altar... had a most interesting event. Large crowd The number of visitors was considerable. According to the same newspaper, September 1880 issue, the L.*. Iris Monthyon has just begun studying a project to affiliate mainly the non-commissioned officers and prepare the army for the unity of peoples, for the Brotherhood of peoples, this great goal of Freemasonry.

Already in 1878, on the occasion of Voltaire's centenary, the lodge Solidarity and Progress of Dijon had heard from a brother, an officer of the army, to present the same ideas:

"This F. - ., in a brilliant improvisation, gives a glimpse of the pro-founder of the abyss that still exists between the civil element and the military ment, and insists in a very particular way on the seriousness duties incumbent upon Freemason soldiers. These include to bridge this gap by bringing together, or rather merging, these two classes of citizens. It is to this difficult task that he wants to dedicate himself all his efforts. He firmly believes that Freemasonry is the link intended to one day cement the union of all the vital forces of the country. In closing, he toasts the unity of the army and the nation.

"The words of this F. - are met with applause.

"A member of the R.-.L.-. Arts and Friendship, Or.-. of Aix, equal The army officer then spoke, saying: "Today More than ever, Freemasonry is called upon to play a major role, a role which, moreover, is imposed upon him. Today the nation and the army do not more than one; they are indivisibly united. Why? Because in the cottage, in the hamlet, as in the castle, all the Patriotic French people know how to obey the laws passed by the national representation. national freely elected. Yes, that's what unites and strengthens society. In France, it is obedience to the laws, however bad they may be. No people has ever been able to walk without laws, and it is to the Freemason nothing that it is his responsibility, to a certain extent, to dictate them; because social Masonic, which must regenerate the world and show civilized nations the path of progress, will one day, I hope, be the mother of all peoples. Allow me then, my brethren, to drink to the Freemason. Universal nonsense. This health is unanimously acclaimed.

Significant genes:

"Freemasonry would cease to have its raison d'être in that case" where all the governments of usurpation and privilege would have been overturned to make way for a regular democratic society, within of which the truth could come to light without raising against her, as today, the clamor and the league of interests aristocratic, in the event that, thanks to the liberalism of public opinion, The Revolution could continue to unfold peacefully, without further rivalries other than those of a noble emulation in the search for truth and of the practice of good. In this latter case, the Freemason nothing would be canceled out, it would become widespread, and all of humanity would no longer be anything but a single Maoist temple.* (1). »

The Masonic writer acknowledges that we are not there yet. and that Freemasonry must continue its secret activities. But its The words tell us how she is already tending towards the affirmation universal connection. It precedes it in environments where, as in In Paris, she is the absolute master of the field, through the multiplication public Masonic ceremonies, and in particular by the mass affiliations of children in certain neighborhoods (2). Freemasonry in power 461

The scenes are undoubtedly grotesque; but we must not forget that it is through affiliations of this kind that Freemasonry had seized the populace of the suburbs of Paris and the large cities in 1788 and 1789 (1), and that she soon found there after instruments for all his crimes (see Book II, Chapter VI, §§ 4, 6 and 14).

Moreover, to make its action more extensive, without giving up to secrecy, which is characteristic of the order (Introduction, SEEN), Freemasonry creates public societies or clubs everywhere under its dependence. Such are the works of the School Fund of which we We have already spoken, the Democratic Union of anti-propaganda clerical, of which the French Republic, official journal of the dictatorship

Everywhere the astonished faces of babies emerge, who hardly doubt that we ▼to initiate them into terrible mysteries. The entertainment at this festival was unparalleled. F.*. Alphonse Humbert, a former convict, wrote essays on children and rejected seminaries, and the University, and advocated republican education, which will make children of "Those little Regulus."

"At a signal from the F.\ V.'., all the children leave the room, accompanied each one a Freemason. After a short dialogue between the Worshipful Master and the two Watchmen stationed near the north and south columns of the temple, three shots were heard. They weave. New presidential signal, and command: "Up with the swords!" The initiating masons, lined up in a double bay, brandish an old sword. They stir, and cross swords with their opposite number, so as to form a triumphal arch, Under which the catechumens, escorted by their godparents, proceed. Arriving at the foot of the altar, they are required by the F.. V.. to swear that their wards will be faithful to the sect's teachings. Therefore, the babies are prevented from entering the corporation.

a The F.\ V.*. descends with a majestic step, a mallet in one hand, a sword of the other; then, successively, placing the sword on the head of each child, he strikes three blows with a mallet on the blade, and pronounce the sacramental words: c Au On behalf of the Free Hive, I acknowledge you as my adopted child.

These are all the active men of the lodges; they organize public lectures are held every Sunday, where the most Outrageous attacks against religion are being heard in order to competition with collectivist socialists and for the greater political gain of opportunistic Jacobins.

The prefects in the departments are competing with each other in zeal with the F.*. Andrieux, even get ahead of him if necessary. In Reims, as early as On May 2, 1880, the prefect authorized the League of Free Thought Reims, whose name clearly indicates its purpose.

The Paris City Council, as in 1791, is the center more active. Its exclusively Masonic composition is sin regularly significant. To facilitate universal affiliation, it formed alongside him, and with members mostly taken within it, a committee for the creation of a circle, which would serve it would be a meeting place for all the masons of Paris, of the province and from abroad. The members of this committee are the FF.*. Thulié, of Ilérédia, Antide Martin, Darlot, Ernest Rousselle, Bétrémieux, de Serres, Petit-Frère and Paillot. The club's premises is located at 42 and 44 Bonne-Nouvelle Boulevard (2).

All that remains is to reconstruct the sections, and the project in is already under consideration: a proposal from Brother Aristide Rey states that The children of Paris' municipal schools will be organized into armed and equipped battalions. The Paris Commune would thus be reconstituted from scratch.

Even in Paris, the lodges are openly taking the direction of the movement. A newspaper very likely to be informed on this point, Belgian Independence, thus reports their action in its issue of October 7, 1880, after having described various other groups
Parisian politicians:

"While the various groups we have just spent in as a true power. This organization adopted the following title:

'Fraternal and civic group'. The borough groups are united between them by a group of delegates comprising eighty members (four per borough). Citizens holding an elected mandate, such as that of a member of parliament or a municipal councillor, are excluded from the group of delegates.

Freemasonry has fifteen thousand active members in Paris, and Von estimates that there are 120,000 Freemasons who have left the association, but remain united with their former colleagues by a community of views and principles. The role of Freemasons has always been predominant in public affairs. Each of the points raised by F.'. Goffin is one of the articles of the radicals' program.

We have not forgotten the speeches of the Brothers.* Pellctan, Jules Favre, Jules Simon in the Legislative Body, from 1865 to 1870, to demand the abolition of standing armies and their replacement by national guards.

After the events of 1870, the radicals could no longer

The abolition of the death penalty is periodically proposed by the FF.*. Louis Blanc and Schoelcher.

The abolition of clergy salaries is the lot of F.*. Gui-Chard, the ardent enemy of the Jesuits, the rapporteur of the budget of cults.

Brother Boysset and seventeen of his colleagues filed on the 30th July 1879 a proposed law aimed at repealing the Constitution cordat, that is to say, the suppression of the compensation due to the clergy in compensation for the property that Catholics were deprived of in 1790. Another set of proposals aims to strip the Catholics from their cemeteries (Rameau, Journault proposal) and Joly, of February 22, 1879), to prevent the clergy from presiding over the Christian burials (Mr. Belle's proposal regarding the pumps) (funerals), to appoint the members of the church councils by the municipal councils (Labuze proposal, dated May 20, 1879).

In this last proposition, the grotesque is mixed with the odious. Citizen Labuze proposes to remove the condition to be Catholic in order to be a churchwarden:

"We don't see," he said, "why we should impose on the members of the church councils are required to be Catholic. They have to ensure the preservation of purely material interests, and for those of their obligations which are related to the necessities of the worship itself, these are obligations that result from the very terms of the law, and the law is equally binding on the faithful of all religions (1).

Despite the absurdity of such a proposal, the commission parliamentary initiative took it into consideration in the month of July 1879.

These latest projects don't even address the passions and to the prejudices of French radicals. One might even wonder how they might present themselves to the mind of the honorable La Buze, if we didn't know that the Belgian Masonic lodges have have been very busy with these questions in recent years (Jiv. II, Chapter XII, § 2), and that Freemasonry is active in all countries with a perfect set.

This is how a series of proposals followed, all aiming to... subject the repeal of the law of November 18, 1814 on the rest of the Sunday, concerning the law of May 20, 1874, on military chaplaincy, of the law of May 21, 1873, on the rights of ministers of religion to be part of the administrative committees of the hospices and

If necessary, those deputies who have reached the point of power to see, those who appreciate its charms and understand its necessities, they oppose their friends with a resistance based not on a diversity agency in principles, but based on a simple concern for opportunity. Hence the origin of opportunistic politics.

But there is one question on which everyone believed they could implement the lodges' program. This is the destruction of Christian education and the establishment of general education tuit, compulsory and secular. It is there that the union of the gauges, which is essentially a Masonic union.

VII – The League of Education

We have already said this (Book II, Chapter IV and Chapter VII, Section 5), and we shall see it again (Book II, Chapter XIII, § 1), everywhere where She can seize public power, the Freemason nothing seeks to abolish Christian teaching, so as to form new generations among whom his destructive doctrines no longer encounter obstacles.

THE REPUBLIC OF 1870

Here we must note the skill with which the Revolution knows how to, through skillful ambiguity, to sow confusion in people's minds. By raising the banner of secular education, she intends to establish the godless school, and it lets the simple believe that it only wants to* to give preference to secular masters over masters very congregational. Equally effective support was given to the fledgling league by the lodges. Its founder was indeed this Brother Jean Macé, function President of the University, who in 1869 presided over the Metz congress, where people began to demand the removal of God's name in the statutes of Freemasonry (book I, chapter II, § 13).

For its part, the Grand Orient also supports the work of the league.

On September 24, 1878, at the banquet given by the Grand-Orient on the occasion of the Universal Exhibition, F.. Bourland, G.. M.\ deputy of G.'. O.\ of Belgium, expresses himself thus:

"The obstacle to France's intellectual development, what is killing it, What is killing us, what is killing the whole world, is ignorance, it is the

Brother Macé said it very well in his report on the League works for 1875:

VIII. – The Ferry Laws

Brother Macé said on January 18, 1879 to the general assembly of the league:

"The fate of our work is so closely linked to that of the republic that the only approach of this senatorial majority, which was therefore to secure the definitive consecration to the republican institution, was sufficient for to accelerate the movement, which has its central support in our country.

This movement began on March 7, 1879, with the presentation bills to which F.*. Ferry attached his name...

Before establishing compulsory, non-religious education, the men of Freemasonry, knowing full well that the vast majority French fathers would flee from such schools, wanted to destroy independent education.

We have already seen the fervor of impiety (Book I, Chapter II, § 13) and the Masonic zeal of Brother Ferry. Not content with his manner celebration of positivism at the lodge La Clémentine Amitié, he had not he never ceased to give the lodges tokens of his devotion. In 1876 we find him performing in front of the Senonais circle (Vosges) of the League of Education a conference that the account – The League's analysis is as follows:

c He demonstrated the usefulness of the league, due to Catholic circles of workers who are multiplying in France, and whose founders do not say they no longer simulate the goal: to abolish the benefits of the last century's revolution "To deny and return to the laws and customs of the Middle Ages."

F. –. Ferry was therefore worthy of being the man of the lodges and he long deserved the trust that F.*. Madier de Mont-Jau testified to him personally and to the exclusion of others ministers, in his programmatic speech of March 16, 1880.

But let us explain the economics of these bills. The first s-bonus the few representatives of private education 'and of major state bodies that had a place on academic councils miques and the Higher Council of Public Instruction. He delivers thus to the arbitrary will of a council appointed exclusively by the minister minister all the rights of citizens in the order of education.

The second is stifled by a series of hypocritical tax provisions.

Combined, the Free Faculties and Universities created in by virtue of the 1875 law. He also wanted to banish from all the levels of education: primary, secondary and higher education, teachers belonging to non-self-governing religious congregations ridiculed. However, it so happens that until now the religious congregations They alone were able, through the strength of their organization and through the paucity of their members, fighting against schools of the state, which is funded by six to seven thousand scholarships and a growing budget always. And, as the State has systematically refused the authorization, which makes them civilians, to most of these congregations, which he can at will and without cause withdraw this authorization to those who, like the brothers of the Christian doctrine If they had obtained it, free education would have been killed in one fell swoop. This blow. These oppressive measures threaten girls' education. as well as that of the boys, and already official persecution began against the humble girls who, under the name of beatresses, have ensured the benefits of education to the people for centuries underprivileged communities of the Cévennes.

In presenting this bill, F.-. Jules Ferry counted on the League of Education and Masonic lodges to ensure his triumph and his continued presence in the ministry. We seize the evidence in some authentic writings and documents, which do not reveal although only a small part of the maneuvers of the lodges and the league teaching:

From the moment the bills were presented, the League of Education was launching its campaign; the central Parisian circle, then the circles The locals successively offered their congratulations to the minister minister, and in response to one of these demonstrations, F.*. Ferry wrote to its president, F.-. Macé:

It is not freedom, but privilege, that target the recent bills, and if I count on their success, it's that I am sure they are responding, as you say, to the wishes of the whole of republican France.

THE REPUBLIC OF 1870

Everywhere, lodges have held numerous conferences in support of draft bills (1). The Union Chain informs us that, on the 5 April, Brother Gambini, Worshipful Master of the lodge La Parfaite Sincérité, gave a lecture in Marseille, where he showed

"But, if the F." We find in the Petit Méridional of September 23, 1879 the summary report of the reception held in honor of Mr. Jules Ferry and leading republican figures, in the lodge Masonic lodge of Perpignan. He had been invited and he had taken care to apologize:

"Last night, the main Republican dignitaries paid a visit to the Masonic lodge and the Republican circle.

Messrs. Lisbonne and Yernhes, deputies from Hérault, obtained a great success in discussing current political issues.

Mr. Paul Bert delivered a remarkable speech, which produced a profound emotion.

After a brilliant reception in the Masonic temple, a punch was offered to all visitors in the club's lounges.

Mr. Jules Ferry, Minister of Public Instruction, Mr. Etienne Arago, former mayor of Paris, and the venerable master of the lodge at St-Jean des Arts" had sent their apologies. The audience was large and even overflowed the garden, which was lit up daylight. Mr. Escarguel, deputy member of the lodge, had not joined his colleagues.

Mr. Mercadier, the venerable, welcomed all the visitors and recalled the glorious titles of the illustrious man to whom Roussil A statue is being erected. – Mr. Emmanuel Arago, on behalf of his family, then he looked back on the past to observe the pro-achievements of the republic, despite the coalition of reactionaries naires.

The first of these deputies made a spontaneous, impromptu remark. The second said that "The reforms desired by the Republican party would have originated in Paris. The name, which is synonymous with freedom and devotion, was acclaimed, and Mr. Harant warmly thanked, in his capacity as a councillor, capital of the great city. He raised a toast to the defenders of humanity, among whom François Arago occupies one of the most prominent positions. At midnight, we parted with cries of: "Long live the Republic!"

In Montpellier, a delegation from the Masonic lodge went to "The station to meet Mr. Ferry."

Freemasonry views these bills so favorably as its work which, in July 1879, the Grand Orient, it is said, approached Father Jules Simon to ask him to withdraw his opposition. This fact, alleged by the Tablets that of a spectator, has never been denied.

The Journal of Belgian Freemasonry of the 11th day of the 11th m.*. 5879 gave the following news: "The Supreme Council of France has just suspended the Hospitallers' logo for six months of St-Ouen. The motif of this suspension is a board addressed seated by this lodge at the Supreme Council and requesting that the F.'. Jules Simon ceases to be a member of the Supreme Council and is struck off. of the general control of Scottish Rite Freemasons. The lodge responded that she would not submit to this decree and that she would continue to to meet as in the past." A few days later, this lodge separated from the obedience of the Supreme Council and constituted, with the approval of Brothers Andrieux, Lepère and Duhamel, the new The powerful Masonic Grand Lodge of Scotland (V. Introduction, II).

The destruction of Catholic private schools is only a pre First step: once the state schools are rid of their competition, we will abolish the provisions of the 1850 law, which place religious and moral education among the subjects of instruction. The following details are provided on this subject:

"We were talking on Saturday to one of the Freemasons at the convent about the negotiation that Mr. de Freycinet had had with the Vatican court regarding the statement from the congregations: "If the president of the council has negotiated "With the Pope," he replied, "Mr. de Freycinet will leave the ministry."
the next day, as the sect member had stated, Mr. de Frey cinet submitted his resignation.

Freemasonry has triumphed since then, and Garibaldi was able to...
to give Gambetta testimonials of satisfaction quite capable of to consolidate his prestige within the party.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

FREEMASONRY IN BELGIUM

I. – Universal war according to Christian teaching,

WORK OF FREEMASONRY.

The legislative proposals presented to the French chambers by The Freemasons Ferry, Sée and Paul Bcrt, are not a con a particular conception of French radicalism: they are the accomplished* gradual unification of the Freemasonry program.

The universality of the declared war on Christian teaching, the tactic adopted in all countries to substitute the State for fathers in the education of young people and to exclude them Religious dogmas are one of the most striking proofs of the action of Freemasonry. The same program is, in In effect, followed point by point, with identically the phases the same, in all countries, and everywhere one finds the action of boxes.

In the United States, the Radical Party has assigned itself the task of putting to place education at all levels in the hands of the State and to make this unsectarian education, that is to say, excluding any principle denominational, by only allowing families to donate at They, in their spare time, as a secondary activity, teach dogma. This is the basis of moral education. an idea that emerged in the United States about forty years ago, was contrary to all the traditions of Protestant denominations. It originated in 1828 within a secret society formed Therein lies the dechristianization of the country. The illustrious Dr. Brownson has revealed in his autobiography, and his actions and aims of this sect, which was obviously linked with the sects of the old world (1). Since then this idea has taken on such an extent that is applied almost universally. However, this diffusion cannot This can be explained by the fact that Masonic lodges, so numerous in this country (Introduction V), they spread it by all means to their disposition. In this system, in effect, the school becomes a lodge. anticipated: children of all faiths – and soon of all faiths sexes – are confused there; these cults, so diverse, so opposed, are proclaimed equally good; – the name of God, where it is conserved, serves only as decoration, each child being free to to form whatever idea he wants. We still allow-temporarily- – to families to provide religious education at home gieux; but that religion must be a matter of private feeling, without influence on social and public life, according to the formula of liberalism. – The morality taught in these schools is purely human in its origin and purpose; it is nothing else. that emptied of sociability, sufficient unto itself, according to the formula developed at the L.\ Clémentine Amicitie by F.\ Ferry (book I, Chapter II, §14).

This is why Freemasonry spreads everywhere same school system.

We have already seen how she systematically pursues him since the 18th century (Book II, Chapter IV), how it tries to carry it out in Germany (Book II, Chapter XII, § 3), in Spain (book I, chap. IV, §3 and book II, chap. XII, § 3), and in France (book II, (Chapter XII, §§ 6, 7, 8, 9). The same is true in Italy. There, in This land is predominantly Catholic, and the populations are not ripe for the uniform legislative application of this system, but The Revolution had already driven out the religious congregations teaching gnantes and it is multiplying schools in all the major cities impious, where the name of God himself is no longer pronounced. This is not These are just steps. Freemasonry wants to go further. far away, and, in June 1877, the general assembly of the Grand Orient Italian has proposed a prize for the author "who, in the course of the year 1878, would send to a commission appointed to reflect to decide on a moral code for the child, which could be "It has replaced Catholic catechism in schools."

In that same year, 1878, in Holland, a law of July 18 voted under the influence of the Public Good Society (1) and voted despite the strong opposition of Catholics and Protestants Orthodox, established the secular nature of education.

Article 2 of the law reads as follows: "The program of the en- The teaching is purely scientific; it does not include research. religion"; and paragraph 3 of article 33: "The responsibility for providing instruction religious matters remain left to the ministers of religion.

Christian in Belgium. This country, which touches us so closely by the community of language and customs, holds in the world a larger space than its territory allows, by the the value of its institutions, the talent of its writers and orators finally, by the importance of the principles involved in its struggles politics. This is also the country where Freemasonry has the most boldly raised its sails and most ostentatiously mingled linked to religious and political conflicts, despite the derisory article which it continues to display prominently at the top of its statutes.

II. – Lodges and the Belgian Liberal Party.

The first Masonic lodges were created in Belgium in the 18th century (2). This country then enjoyed, under the domination Austrian, with a highly developed local autonomy and freedoms popular ones based on Catholicism, as in the Middle Ages.

(1) At the end of the last century, in 1784, in Holland, a Monnonite pastor, Jean Nieuwenhyscn founded the Public Welfare Society, which, along with Freemasonry, "was committed to combating prejudices among children, as well as among adults" "Superstition," according to its own program. Beneath a harmless appearance, it has contributed powerfully to spreading the ideas of Freemasonry, of which it is one of the popular forms (Gf. Introduction, F.) V, on this society, very precise details given by M. deMoussac in his work: The Intelligence League, p.9 and 234.

(2) Or one will find in the attached documents a rather curious episode of the propagation Masonic and philosophical doctrines in the Austrian Netherlands 18th century.

Under French rule, a time of great development
 Freemasonry and lodges multiplied even further. After the events
 Following the decrees of 1814 and 1815, Belgium was incorporated into Holland Protestant by a Machiavellian calculation of the Vienna Code of Congress (book.
 II, chap. VII, § 1), had the misfortune of serving as a refuge for revolutions French citizens. They found a warm welcome in the lodges existing ones, and they in turn gave them an anti-Christian character much more pronounced than they had then. Mr. Amand Neut, in his remarkable collection of Masonic Documents, sketched the story of an apostate priest, from Saint-Martin, former advisor-clerk at the Parliament of Paris, then advisor at the court of cassation, and that Napoleon I had entrusted several missions of trust in the united countries. This wretch, settled in Liège

The Belgian liberals of that era, at least those who were

 A Protestant prince would have suited their purposes much better. A member

 During the Estates General, Mr. Reyphins exclaimed: "There was a necessity to organize public education and to take wise measures to

be instructed in good principles, in principles that conform to our customs and our institutions." – Next to Mr. Reyphins. Mr. Do-Tringe spoke in a similar manner; both accepted the honors of the Council of State, and believed they were serving liberal principles by prodigant, in concert with the government, launched the least measured attacks to the clergy and the Jesuits (ii). »

However, the national movement of 1830 led to most liberals. Belgian Catholics, who formed the immense majority of the country, influenced by the spirit of the times and obeying a generosity that disregarded the bad faith of their adversaries, enshrined in the constitution articles keys that ensured unlimited freedom for the propagation of all the doctrines. A loyal civil tolerance was absolutely necessary. Rare at that time under the conditions of Belgian society; the vice the constitution of 1831 was to grant error the same rights only to truth and thus to profess indifferentism. The concessions made to the error of time did not even achieve the pacification and the union that generous men expected from it they granted them imprudently.

Those Belgian liberals who belonged to Freemasonry they protested and rallied around Mr. Defacqz a counter to the freedoms enshrined in the fundamental pact. From then on they proclaimed that "temporal power must to prime and somehow absorb spiritual power," and They added, more or less, in their organ, the newspaper L'Indépendant dant: "We do not adopt the anarchic maxim which, in "The congress found many supporters: freedom in all "And for all" is not our motto. The religious society is "powerful in Belgium; we believe it is our duty to sur "It is necessary to monitor its progress and combat its invasions."

At the Court of Cassation, Mr. Defacqz gradually asserted his viewpoint throughout the Liberal party (2). Men of good faith

She now declares open war on Catholicism, she wants on the ruins of the Church establish the dogmatic omnipotence of the State, and finally, with its most advanced members, it confines to socialism.

There is nothing more instructive than following the fine work of Mr. Wocstc, whom we have already quoted, this anti-Catholic evolution lique and radical of Belgian liberalism; but what is important to What we can observe here is that the authors of this evolution are at the same time at the time the leaders of Freemasonry, that today the leadership of The Belgian Liberal Party belongs to the lodges, and the lodges obey it. to the impetus that came to them from Berlin, from the center of the Kulturkampf.

Defacqz, Vcrhaegen, Defré were all the great directors members of Freemasonry and leaders of the liberal party. They have returned countered in their double work by a secret, but effective, support, in the prince whom the European powers gave in 1832 for king in Belgium. That Freemasonry was henceforth the linchpin of the party's policy Liberal, that's what F.*. Verhaegen said in 1848:

From 1855 onwards, the Grand Orient of Belgium took an open approach. the leadership of the Liberal Party is firmly in their hands, as these two documents:

On the 5th day of the 11th month (January) 1855, the Grand Committee, which is the permanent section of the Grand Orient, made the following decisions
